What does the week of reflection mean to you?

Katherine Hannah, 3rd year, Political Science, Toronto, Ont.

"For me, it means remembering all the people in the past who have been persecuted for their gender in any instance, not just the Montréal massacre, but from hundreds of years ago when women weren't allowed to speak out against anything. This week means remembering that, and being grateful that they did take the opportunities when they could — they did fight to vote so that I can go to school today."

Alix Dostel, 2nd year, Political Science, Halifax

"...to recognize the disparity between men and women...women have had a lot more obstacles to surmount to get where they are today. There still is a lot more that has to be done before we can really recognize men and women as equals. Violence against women is something that's prevalent in society both in the home and in the streets; both men and women should recognize this and how this has to be altered."

Joe Bentby, 3rd year History, London, Ont.

"This is a week to consider the problem that it (violence against women) exists and to stress to the government that laws concerning violence against women and the abuse of women should be emphasized more. It is something that is addressed, but not effectively. It still goes on, however society overlooks it due to loopholes in the system."

Amit Bhatnigar, 1st year Computer Science, Dartmouth, N.S.

"It's very important to me actually — back then I didn't realize what was going on — but now it's just a way to bring out to people that this stuff does go on in the world and that it has to be dealt with."

Sharme Gnanapandithan, 1st year History, Halifax

"It (violence against women) should be stopped. It's ridiculous, I can't even feel safe enough to walk on Dal campus. I don't think that violence against women can be stopped."
