A party of English travellers dwelt for a few days in the adjacent town, and soon discovered that the grand old forest oaks were good to dine under. They knew generally that the place was accursed and was believed to harbour spectres if not worse things. Before this generation was born, a lord of the castle had gone suddenly abroad, and his lady mother who remained at home had cursed the forest and permitted no wood to be felled, no labor to be done in it. This curse the family kept up, and except use of the necessary paths, the forest had been for almost a century untouched by man. It was the more luxuriant for that, and the smooth plot of grass in which the
