John had not enjoyed the privilege of knowing Diana during her childhood, or he would have appreciated this sudden reversion to the tone and phraseoligy of that happy time. He only smiled and said:

"That last custom istamps the country at once with the seal of the highest civilization."

"You are undoubtedly my superior in argument," returned the girl with a movement of her long throat which was both graceful and charming in its half-laughing petulance. "Instead of subjecting me to any further defeat, suppose you tell me this wanderful thing which you have in reserve. I can't imagine what you have to say to me, and I am devoured with curiosity to know."

John did not answer at once. A walk with a girl like Diana was a totally new experience to him, and he was surprised to hind how much he enjoyed it. So little was he used to walting with women, that it never entered his head to alter his habitual long, swinging step when walking by Diana's side; and he was progressing with his usual speed, lost in reflection, instead of attending to what his companion said, when he heard a breathless voice at his side saying, "How you fire! You remind me of

"I thought it was a dog's grave. But I think they were very wise. Why should they have to pay fees? burrying and marrying come in the natural scope of a clergyman's work. Weddings, at least, ought to be performed for love."

He repressed the smile which came on his lips, and said:
"Possibly; but you will agree that a country in such things are done and tolerated cannot be called a civilized country in our sense of the word, and may permit other things to go on which would not be suffered in England."

"Oh, well," said Diana, "England is not verywhere, and what's the harn? I should think that the child is safer and wholesomer, in that field than in the churchyard, where in a year or two his bones would be tossed out of his grave again to make room for someone else."

She was half laughing as she finished speaking, and after looking at her for a moment, he too burst out laughing, and they both laughed until they nearly cried. "Why did you not tell me sooner that I was going too fast?" he asked, as they went on again at a more moderate pace.

"I kept up with you as long as I could. English people never like to confess themselves beaten, and in this hostile land one feels inclined to force one's national characteristics into undue prominence."

"Ohe I' she answered; "is that the principle on which you are making your railway? But now tell me what you wanted to say; you keep putting it off in the most cunning way. Is it something very disagreeable which you do not like to bring out?"

"That your own conscience must decide for you. You post your letters very care lessly, Miss Wentworth."

"What do you mean?"

He told her what had occurred at the post-office, and she laughed carelessly, and asked with some curjosity:

"Which one was it? I posted three."

He repeated the address to her, and she said.

"Oh! that—mamma's. It was of no importance."

"Yes, into Frau Camphausen's hands for example. She would have been quite pleased at what was in it."

"Why?"

"Oh, because I have never given any one a true description of this place. No one wanted me to come, and I would come; so I have always practiced a little deception on my friends, and told them how comfortable I am here."

"Are you not comfortable?" he asked, bluntly.

DIANA WENTWORTH

"Are you not comfortable?" he asked, bluntly.

"Does it strike you as a place in which one would be comfortable?" she asked with a little edge in her voice.

"Well, no. To tell the truth, I was rather surprised to find you still here when I came back from Berg."

"Were you?" she answered. "I am not you."

"Then why not say it, and let us each go on our way again? I was enjoying my walk."

"It is too late for you to be out on this road alone. It is never very safe; thieves and cutthroats find it conveniently near the frontier. Berg is under Russian government. You would be exposed to risk at any time, and capecially now, with the navies about."

"Thieves and cutthroats?" she echoed, with a derisive laugh. "Do you scriously with a derisive laugh. "Do you seriously on our way again? I was enjoying my walk."

"It is too late for you to be out on this road alone. It is never very safe; thieves and cutthroats filt to conveniently near the frontier. Berg is under Russian government. You would be exposed to risk at any time, and especially now, with the navies about."

"Thieves and cutthroats?" she echoed, with a derisive laugh. "Do you seriously expect me to believe in those bogies in the nineteenth century in a civilized country? If thieves and cutthroats are the only dangers to be feared, I will undertake to walk from Jacewo to Berg and back again without a single qualm of fear."

"He heard her out, without being in the least disturbed by her scepticism.

"You talk like a child," he said when she had done. "There was a pause before John said, in a now of some constraint: "Perhaps some day we may be sufficient who will run great risks on the chance of a successful robbery. As for the nineteenth century and a civilized country, this country is a long way off the nineteenth centry and leaves much to be desired in point of civilization. You may have noticed as you came along a little mound by the side of the road, with a rough wooden cross at one end. That is the grave of a child who has died since I have been here.
