The evening classes are a starting point, and upon the response made by the workers of London will depend the rate of development of technical education in the city. The classes are intended to be the nucleus of a technical school, open both day and night to students as well as to those already in employment. When a technical school is fully established, it may be entered by pupils leaving the primary schools, as an alternative to the Collegiate Institute. The studies will be mainly vocational, directing boys and girls to their chosen work, but the cultural side will not be overlooked Such a school would induce many children to continue their education instead of going to work after leaving the primary schools. It would also divert a number who would otherwise go to the Collegiate Institute. So far as London is concerned it would obviate the necessity of a second collegiate institute and relieve the overcrowding
