wildly gesticulating, flinging his arms about the object of emphasizing his remarks. Finally in one of his finest periods his right arm and hand in a denunciatory sweep came down full on the hat of the Prince of Wales, who as usual with membera in both houses of parliament was sitting with his high silk hat on his head. The hat, badly damaged, was knocked down upon the heir apparent's nose, to his intense astonishment, it being probably the first time in his life that he had been thus bouncted. Of course there was what the French would describe as "emotion" through the august assembly, the Duke of York growing purple in the face in his efforts to prevent himself from exploding into loud laughter, and comicality of the situation being increased by the utter unconsclossness of the old earl as to the fact that he had been guilty of something much akin to "less majesty."

The then Prince of Wales, as soon as he had grasped the situation, smiled good naturedly, moved out of the reach of Lord Wempss' arm, and endeavored for the next few moments to repair his damaged head-gear.

After living alone for many years in a small cottage at Dover England, an aged woman named Marsh was found dead in her bedroom, and in crannies and crevices all over the house were found packets containing gold, silver and bronze. So far £187 has been found.

Proudley's Bad Break.

From The Chicago Journal.

"Mrs. Guschley remarked to me that it must be pleasant to be married to a ci-verman," said Procidey's wife.

"And what did you say?" queried

Proudley.
"I told her, of course, that I didn't know; that I had only been married once."

Can anyone answer the conundrum why, a member who represents a Quebec constituency should feel it incumbent upon himself to make a lengthy speech in the French language? There is nothing unparliamentary in that course, especially if the speaker is not stire of himself in the English tongue. During the past week two Quebec members their native tongue. The curious fact is that the members in question, Messra. Bourassa and Lavergne, and why they did not follow the example of Messra. be the absolute truth.

"If the western nations are to continue to hold their own then they must abandon the habit of flocking into cities and living in slums. What is the remedy? I believe there are remedies at hand. I am sent to investigate certain small colonies which have been instituted, and if I can find that they are what they are said to be, or if there is some key to open this mighty door, I believe that, with sympathetic management, men and women can again be brought back to the land.

"It is worth while to help in that movement. It is no small thing; it is the greatest. I do hope that what I have said may carry some conviction with you, and that all of you may do what I believe is a very great and vital work."
