THE ROAD TO PROSPERITY.

La Presse, Montreal: "Until recent years, a young man, on leaving college, considered he had the choice of only three professions—that of the lawyer, the notary or the doctor. He never had any idea of directing his knowledge elsewhere than in the liberal professions, and it would surely have been considered a forfeiture if he had, for example, devoted himself to agriculture on the paternal farm. His parents would not have suffered it. They would have considered money spent on education wholly wasted if their son came to the decision to become a farmer. Happily, these false ideas are disappearing little by little, so that today it is beginning to be realized that a classical education can lead to other occupations than those of the lawyer and doctor. As Mr. Taschereau observed the other day, the university can do a very great deal to assist this movement. It can open up new avenues along which to direct our young people. It has done so already to an appreciable extent, and it is a question now of continuing the good work. The province of Quebec must not lag behind in developing its technical education and in facilitating the work of research and experiment. With every one in his place, prepared to play his part, it is certain the country will advance more rapidly along the road of prosperity."

LONDON'S HIDDEN GARDENS.
(Answers, London.)
Stern grey buildings jealously guard the gardens of London Town, and you have to be a Paul Fry to discover these green cases of ours.

Quite near the Angel Inn at Islington there is a small but beautifully-kept garden just visible from the 'bus-top. All around are factories and workshops, tenements and ugly disorder, but in the little garden is cool, green and peace.

Another pretty spot is found near the old Sadler Wells music hall, while through a long, narrow slit in a grim-looking brick wall in West London, one finds a large garden, thickly strewn with statues. This secret garden was a haunt of Sir E. Burne-Jones.

Near Hyde Park Corner another old-world garden exists; in West Kensington the habitude knows of a view of meadowland, with a country lane running alongside; behind the Bank of England is yet one more city garden, while among the better known are the famous Heri Gardens in Chelsea, and, of course, the sylvan retreats of the Temple.
