Now, the balancing—the adjusting of impression and inspiration—is, of all processes in life, the most delicately fine. The simple sound of the word "love" coming at that precise juncture changed the whole current of Loder's thought. It fell like a seed, and like a seed in ultraproductive soil, it bore fruit with amazing rapidity.

The word itself—was small and the manner in which it was spoken trivial, but Loder's mind was attracted and held by it. The last time it had met his ears his environment had been vastly different, and

"Why, where's your sense of humor? The motive of the plant debars all seriousness." CHAPTER XXXI. FEW minutes before the cur-fain fell on the second act of "Other Men's Shoes" Loder rose from his seat and made his apologies to Lilian. At any other moment he might have condered over her manner of acceptng them-the easy indifference with which she let him go. When Lillian Astrupp had given her dictum, when the music of the orchestra had ceased and the curtain risen on the second act of the play, nothing but a sense of stupefaction had filled his mind. In that moment the great song was si-lenced, not by any portentous episode, not by any incident that could have lent dignity to its end, but, with the full measure of life's irony, by a trivial social commonplace. In the first sen-sation of blank loss his faculties had been numbed. In the quarter of an hour that followed the rise of the cur-tain he had sat staring at the stage, seeing nothing, hearing nothing, filled with the enormity of the void that suddenly surrounded him. Then from habit, from constitutional tendency, he had begun slowly and perseveringly to draw first one thread and then ar other from the tangle of his thoughts, to forge with doubt and difficulty the chain that was to draw him toward the
