

HELEN MOIR

OR LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE. CHAPTER XXIX. JOINING THE ARMY.

On coming to the foot of the hill which ran parallel with the river, and finding that the road along which the wagons were to travel made a detour, to avoid the declivity, Edwin resolved to take the shorter route over the heights and either rejoin the military train on the other side, or if the camp was at no great distance, proceed thither by the most direct road that could be found.

In the pursuance of this resolution, he and Ritchie had left the wagons and the soldiers, in whose company they had come to the frontier, and struck into the narrow and broken path which wound its way up among the vineyards, and led by many a devious turning to the western slopes.

This they did at their own risk, and not without a representation from the officers in charge of the escort that they might come to some grief through wandering by themselves. Confusion, excitement, alarm, suspicion, and inflamed passions had spread with violence and rapidly since the war was declared, and the numbering and advance of the army had increased the disorder, so that strangers travelling alone through the suddenly unsettled country might be subject to harsh usage at the hands of the people.

As yet they had suffered no interruption in their journey; and now they had accomplished the whole of the eastern ascent and by the gradual dip of the ground imagined they were nearing the opposite slopes from the vantage ground of which they expected to obtain a view of the river and the low ground which environed it. The path by which they had gone was beautiful in the extreme, leading as it did among the shady vineyards, where the cool green foliage subdued for them the sun's heat, and where from picturesque cottages latticed the pretty dark-green sides of the south gazed on them as they went by, or the embowered and swartly countenances of the vine-keepers stared at them in surprise, but never in anger or with the appearance of evil intention. Once even, at one of the prettiest cottages they passed, where an old woman sat in the porch, and a laughing-faced girl of twelve or fourteen stood at her back, they sought for and obtained with cheerful alacrity a draught of sweet milk, which sent them on refreshed as much by the bright and kindly smile of its giver as by the milk itself. They could not exchange one word with her, but the language of the face is common over the world, and that of the innocent peasant girl spoke eloquently of kindness and goodwill, which they tried to answer in kind, and succeeded, if they might judge by the sparkling glances of her clear shining eyes and the deepening blush of pleasure on her peach-like cheeks.

It was shortly after this pleasant little episode of the journey that someone upon them treading the mazes of the path, and eagerly looking forth at every opening for the expected prospect of the plain below.

Just then they came to an open space, clear of vines, at the top of a very steep grassy declivity, and all at once there burst on their sight the view they had been looking for, but with such a brilliance of extent and beauty as to bring them both to a stand-still, and cause admiring exclamations to come from their lips.

Down in the valley, with many winding curves, an river, clear and shining, welled near to it, and on this side lay the famous German spa, presenting a scene of great beauty and interest. Bodies of troops were moving to and fro over the plain; great companies were marching with solid precision along routes converging towards the main body, who were concentrated in immense squadrons and far-spreading divisions on the level ground between the hills and the river.

It was stated at a Cabinet meeting yesterday that the reply from England to your note relative to the negotiative principle of international law, was received. It is so unsatisfactory that the position of President Grant—that the question of consequential damages is one for the Geneva Tribunal to settle—will be insisted upon. The President is said to be dissatisfied with the course of Secretary Fish, and has invited the Foreign Committees of Congress to meet him this Saturday morning to consider the situation and advise upon the future course in the matter.

It is an interesting fact, as stated in the London Engineer, that the pin-making machine invented by Mr. Wright, an American, nearly fifty years ago, is still employed, in an improved form, in the largest pin manufactories in England. As now used in the latter, a principal shaft gives motion in its rotation to several sliders, levers and wheels, which work the principal parts of the machine. A slider pushes forward pinners, which draw wire from a reel at every rotation of the shaft.

At a young ladies debating club the following question was recently discussed: Which gives a girl most pleasure, to hear herself praised, or another girl run down? No decision was arrived at.
