Another Canadian family has removed to the western metropolis. About three months ago the firm of Deacon & Small, hotel-keepers, was dissolved, and Wm. A. Small, the retiring pattner, accepted a lucrative situation on the World's Fair grounds in Chicago as superintendent of the blacksmith shops. Recently Mr. Small was invited to become a shareholder in a company to manufacture a popular new Russian drink. The Russian consul was one of the directors, and at a late meeting Mr. Small was offered the position of manager of the company at a liberal salary. He accepted, and yesterday he returned with his family to his new home after a few days' visit with his old friends here. The company will sell its manufactures only in Chicago until after the World's Fair, and agencies will then be formed throughout the continent. The many friends of Mr. Small will be pleased to hear of his success.

Miss O'Brien Appears Again.

Another big crowd of spectators was at the Police Court this morning to see Miss Lizzie O'Brien, of Buffalo, who has of late become notorious on account of her strange conduct and strange doings. She had her wits about her and was ready for anything that might come. Detective Rider sat beside her on a bench in front of the prisoners' cage and to him she chatted freely while justice was being meted out to the other prisoners. J. C. Judd appeared as her counsel. A city druggist has laid an information charging her with obtaining goods, valued at Sô, under false pretenses. Mrs. A. G. McLeod, the first complainant against Miss O'Brien, is in Toronto and unable to attend court, so both cases were adjourned by consent for a week. As the prisoner was leaving the court she turned towards the crowd of spectators and waving her handkerchief said, "This is the dead march."
