ONTARIO JOCKEY CLUB-OPEN-

ING DAY.

Toronto, Sept. 27.-The autumn race

meeting of the Ontario Jockey Club opened auspiciously this afternoon.

The weather, which had threatened rain all morning, cleared up about noon, and the remainder of the day was fine and warm. While the crowd was not as large as those which gather at the spring meetings, the attendance was much heavier than the ronto in past years. Among the spectators was Hon. Mr. Tarte, who was prior to the start of the races. Large fields were the rule, and not a start was made under ten, while entries were even larger. Seagram's were scratched because of the failure of his string to arrive on the grounds until the last minute. The most striking race of the day was the mile and a furlong handicap for the Toronto Autumn Cup. Sea-gram's Temocracks, Farrockaway and Gold Cure were scratched at the last minute and changed the complexion of Hich walked up and down the sidewaik, thankful that it had all passed so quickly as not to attract attention, for he had no desire for a public scandal, and he had not taken but two or three turns when Anhie Hunting made her appearance again. He met her at the foot of the marble steps.

"Has he gone?" she asked, glancing "Has he gone?" she asked, glancing anxiously about.

"Yes; he has been gone some minutes," Rich replied, reassuringly, "and now I intend to take you safely to your own door, and see that nothing further transpires to frighten you."

He drew her small hand within his arm with a feeling, almost, of proprietorship in her, while her low-spoken but grateful thanks told him that her frightened heart was set entirely at rest by his assurance of protection.

"Miss Hunting." he began, after a mohe began, after a mo-

"I wish I was not obliged to, Mr. Wal-"I wish I was not obliged to, mr. Wal-"I wish I was not obliged to, Mr. Waldemar," she answered, "but I cannot always regulate my actions by my wishes. Many times I am obliged to take work home to finish, as in this case, and when it is completed carry it to the parties to whom it belongs."
"I see," Rich responded, thoughtfully.
"But, at least, you can promise this much, that when you are detained late, or have to go upon these nightly errands. or have to go upon these nightly errands, you will either ask someone to go with you or take a car. I fear that you may meet with even worse persecution than that from which I delivered you tonight. I believe that man is a black-hearted rascal, and you must be protected in some way from him."

"You are very kind," Annie Hunting replied, "and I am very grateful for all that you have done for my comfort and safety. I will cheerfully make the promise you desire—indeed, I feel that it will be a necessary precaution."

Then he began to talk of other things, to draw her mind from her recent unpleasent experience.

Among other things, he asked her regarding her duties in the sewing-room—if they were particularly laborious or "One must not quarrel with one's bread and butter, Mr. Waldemar," she said, somewhat sadly. "I cannot say that my somewhat sadiy. I cannot say that my life is an agreeable one, but it is not nearly so hard as that of some others that I know. I have often wished, however, that I could get into some quiet household as family seamstress, and then I should escape many annoyances to which I am now subjected."

which I am now subjected."
"Surely there are many such places in the city," Rich said, eagerly, thinking such a situation would be far better for

"Doubtless there are, if one could only know about them," she returned, with a sigh.

A sudden bright thought came to Rich.

"If I could secure such a position for you, would you accept it?" he asked.

"I should be only too glad to do so, Mr. Waldemar, for it would at least insure me protection against such annoyances as I have suffered tonight."

"I may not be able to do anything for you in that way," Rich continued; but I have some friends who, I think, might knew of such a place. They were about going away for a few weeks, but if you will only take care of 'number one' until they return. I believe they will be able

"Mrs. and Miss Campbell!" said Annie, quickly. "They are very nice; Mrs. Campbell is always so considerate, and her daughter has something kind to say whenever I see her. I have worked upon a good many garments for them."

"Yes, they are very amiable people." Rich returned, while in his mind he was contrasting Miss Campbell's brilliant. luxurious life with that of this toiling sewing-girl; "and I really believe they would be interested for you if I should speak to them of you."

"You are very good, Mr. Waldemar," Annie said, and there was a suspicion of tears in her voice, "and—I want—to thank you, too, for those cheering little blossoms which you left at my door for me a short time ago."

You were not offended? May I send you some more?—you will not consider me presuming if I do?" he asked, eagerly, though somewhat incoherently.

"How could I be offended at such a kind remembrance?" she said, half reproachfully. "They made me think of home and papa, too, for we had a variety of Scotch roses in which he used to take a good deal of pride; he dearly loved at light of flowers."

"Where was your home, Miss Hunting, before you came to New York?" Rich Brooklyn."

"So near as that! and have you no friends or relatives there who would care for you?" "No-no one who would wish to be burdened with a penniless orphan. My mamma was an orphan when papa married her; she had some distant relatives, somewhere in the country, but they were simple people who seldom left home, and I never heard anything about them excepting by hearsay. "And did he—excuse me if I am too free—did he make no provision for you when he died?" he asked.

By this time they had reached her home, and Rich did not feel at liberty to prolong the conversation. Yet he lingered while bidding her good-night. "I hope." he said, as he held her hand in a fond clasp, "your dreams will not be haunted by any unpleasant visionary return of that miserable fellow who annoyed you so tonight."

"Why, Mr Waldemar." she exclaimed, with a silvery little laugh, "you had made me forget all about him!"

"Thank you. I wish I could exorcise all your troubles as easily," Rich said, in a low, earnest tone.

With another pressure of that small hand, Rich said his final "good-night" and went his way.

The annual regatta of the London Rowing Club was held down the river near Springbank on Saturday afternoon. It was attended by a large and fashionable crowd. About half an hour before the time set for the commencement of the regatta the sky was heavily overcast, and great black clouds threatened to pour down rain upon the city and prevent the races. The storm fortunately passed over and left the day fine, but it caused a much lighter attendance than there would have been otherwise.

The river was in quite good condition for racing. At the point where the regatta was held it is always of sufficient depth, but the height of It was anyone's race until within 40

Black and Hosie. Fast and Interesting.

The first of the series of baseball games for the championship of the city, to be played between the London and McClary teams took place on Saturday at Tecumseh Park before one of the largest and most enthusiastic crowds of the season. It was won by the McClary club in fine style. Although the game looked as if it were going to McClarys almost from the first, there were sufficient brilliant plays and enough work for all to prevent lagging. McClarys men proved that their spare hours had been utilized to the very best effect, and that the Wholesale League can supply just as good ball as the men who play in Tecumseh Park.

Both pitchers, Sheere and Phillips, were in the pink of condition, a fact easily verified by a glance at the summaries. Both did admirable work, although neither struck out more than three men. Nevertheless, Sheere did not permit a man to walk, while Phillips can only be discredited with allowing two to go to first without working for it. The error columns of the summary vouches for the abilities of the fielders of the respective sides, although several fumbles were made which, while they were misplays, could and Weaver.

There was probably no room for adverse criticism toward a member of either team. Every player on both sides played the game of his life. There appeared to be no particular weakness in the playing of the Londons. The loss of the game can be at-tributed to their failure to make good at the first of each inning.
