The final draft and printing of the treaty was not finished until late yesterday, almost at the last moment a whole page having to be reprinted be cause of a slight alteration in the text.

Numerous Questions. Dependent upon the final ratification of the treaty rests the settlement of numerous complex questions connected with the water boundaries which have been the source of more or less annoyance at different times. Included in these are the regulations of the use of the waters of the great lakes, with the secondary, but none the less important question of the diversion of the waters of these boundaries, including Niagara Grainsborough Trinity 2, Bolton Wan- Falls, which involve that of the amount of water to be taken out for power purposes, the navigation of the St. John's River between Maine and New Brunswick, and the use of the Milk River in the Northwest. To some extent the operations of the treaty will supersede the work of the international waterways commission, made up of representatives of the 5 United States and Canada, whose duty includes among other things the ascertainment and re-establishment of the location of that portion of the internatical boundary between the United States and Canada passing through the great lakes. That feature of its work, however, will be continued by the waterways commission until it is completed, its other portion gradually being absorbed by the joint high commission to be appointed in accordance with the treaty signed tonight. Although no official statement is obtainable, it is the understanding that the contracting powers have agreed upon a line of principles which are to guide the commission in its work, leaving to them the interpretation of these principles as applicable to the questions that may require settlement immediately, and for those that may arise from time to time. This takes from the joint high commission any functions of a treaty-making body and confines its duties simply to that of determining to what extent principles already laid down shall be applicable in any particular case.

The treaty is regarded as one of great importance, and the hope is expressed that its effective operation will result in permanently putting an end to the difference between the United States and its neighbors on the north. BOWLING
