With the presence in the city of Sir John Martin Harvey, who is here to play to London audiences in two of his most successful roles-as Count Skarlatine, in The Cigarette Maker's Romance, and as Hamlet, in Shakespeare's play-London extends the hospitality of her spirit and the comforts of her hostels to an out-standing Englishman, in many ways apart altogether from his profession s an actor. The glimmer of his star of destiny across the footlights so steadily and brightly for the past few years obscured to a certain extent other meritorious achievements of London Town Planners Recomthis extremely versatile man. Re noved from the stage he would still be able to earn a livelihood, even in this age of exacting competition and commercialized art by his pen and his brush. For some years in his younger ways Sir John, then plain John Martin Harvey, studied in the Slade School of Art, in old London, and to this added a period when he worked in the Heatherley studios. Always a ruling passion with him, this practical experience in line and color has been of incalculable help to him in his stage arrangements and there is no one connected his companies more interested and more acutely critical of the setting and values of stage mechanics as an aid to the presentation of a play than Sir John. Of a family with a long record of naval associations his father was John Harvey, a member of the Institute of Naval Architects, and it was naval construction designing that the future actor was intended by his parents to follow. The boy, however, showed early in life such a strong predeliction for the stage and such aptitude toward all things historic that his people, after he left King's College School, consented to his making the change, which was to result in adding one more artistic thinking man of good taste and

His recognition as an artistic actor more than usually gifted abilities of voice, of presence, and of that supreme ability of submerging himself entirely in any character he portrayed, came when the London 'Pelleas and Mellisande' at the Prince of Wales Theatre in The next year he appeared in a role which perhaps more than any other made his own and invested with his own personality and manerism, Sydney Carton, in "The Only
