THIS HUMDRUM LIFE.

BY THORNTON.

"I am so tired of this humdrum life," said pretty Ellen Wentworth. "Every day the same dull round! I wish something would happen; I don't care what, if it would only bring a little excitement."
"My child!" said her mother, in a tone of mild reproach, "how can you talk so?"
"How can I?" replied the daughter. "Because I think it's very hard on me, having to live in this way at home, and never, or rarely, get any new dresses, while Helen Somers, who is no better than I am, and not so good-looking, has dresses from New York, and doesn't have to work her fingers off. What have I done to have so different a life? It's all because her father happens to be rich. I don't see why I was born, if I have to go drudging in this way day in and day out."
"I am really shocked, Ellen, to hear you talk so," said her mother, now speaking severely. "I've no doubt, if we knew everything, we'd find out that Helen Somers has her troubles as well as the rest of us. Probably, just like you, she envies some one richer than herself. Perhaps she is discontented because she can't live in Paris. Everything, my dear, in life is relative. Content comes from a rightly-disciplined mind, and has very little, indeed, to do with the mere accidents of fortune."
"Oh, yes, it's different," Helen Somers don't have to sprinkle and fold clothes, and mend socks, and make shirts for her father. I don't believe there was ever anybody had to drudge as I do."
Her mother sighed, and was silent for a moment. Then she resumed:
"Ellen, don't you think your father, whose shirts, it seems, you could against, has to drudge also? He is not a clerk from choice, I assure you—and at his time of life! But he was ruined, you say, by a friend—lost all he had, and has never since been able to save enough money to go into business on his own account again. Yet he toils on, without a complaint, and at work that is particularly distasteful to him. How often he comes home at night utterly fagged out! He has been drudging, too, in this way for twenty years. Many a time, to my knowledge, he has sacrificed his own comfort in order that you might have a new dress. Believe me, dear, there are worse drudges than waiting new dresses, or having to drudge, as you call it."
The tears sprang to Ellen's eyes. She was not really a bad daughter. She sincerely loved her father. But she was young, and her somewhat uneventful existence often fretted her, as it did today.
What answer she would have made we cannot say, for at that instant there was a loud hurried knock at the door. There was something in the knock that made mother and daughter look at each other with white faces; and then both started simultaneously for the front entrance.

They shrank back at the sound of that knock. It was that of a son of Mr. Wentworth's employer, a young gentleman they knew but slightly. His very presence there foreboded disaster, and he looked as if he had some terrible message to deliver. He began to speak lamely, and before he had uttered more than a word or two, the husband's monotonous tread, as if bearing a heavy burden slowly and carefully, came on the ear. With a shriek, the wife and mother would have rushed past him, but he caught her by the arm, and said, hurriedly:
"It is not as bad as you think. Mr. Wentworth is only hurt. He fell down the backway. He is not even injured. Let us hope for the best."
But Mrs. Wentworth was not to be kept back from his grasp, rushed down the steps, and in another moment was by her husband's side. Ellen made an effort to follow her, but suddenly everything seemed to swim about her. Instantly she stretched out her hands. The next moment she would have fallen on the ground, if young Mr. Ewing had not caught her just in time.

The weeks that followed were anxious ones. For many days Mr. Wentworth's death was daily expected. The physicians feared some inward hurt, and hesitated to hold out even the slightest hope. But fortunately their prognostications proved incorrect. Mr. Wentworth's leg was broken, but that was all; and after a week the danger was past.
But what a week it had been for Ellen! There was not an hour in which she did not reproach herself for what she now called "her wicked work." Half the night she lay weeping. Often she was on her knees, in the privacy of her chamber, praying with sobbing and broken articulation, for her father's life. "Spare him to us, oh, God!" she cried; spare him; let him not die for my fault." It was like the wail of a broken heart. Her heart would have broken if her father had died.

She realized now the truth of what her mother had said, that the Mackinaws in Queen's park this afternoon. She wrung her hands as she thought of it. "Oh, I would drudge forever," she cried, "and be thankful, if only father could get well." When the physicians said, at last, that there was no serious internal injury, and that Mr. Wentworth, with good nursing, would recover, she flew to her room, and, on her knees, poured out her thanks again and again.

On his knees, poured out her thanks again and again. The moral is told. But sometimes out of the deepest sorrow there blooms, as if to teach a profound lesson, unexpected happiness. It was so in this case. Young Mr. Ewing saw much of Ellen during her father's illness. He called daily to inquire after Mr. Wentworth's condition, and as Mrs. Wentworth herself left the sick chamber, it was Ellen that generally came down to him. Subtly and softly, and by degrees, she had never appeared to better advantage; indeed, she had never been so worthy as now, and the influence remained through life. A mutual attachment sprang up between the two. There was nothing to delay the marriage, and the first day that Mr. Wentworth went out when his daughter was united in church to the husband of her choice.
Mr. Wentworth is now a partner in the house of Ewing, Son & Co. Young Mr. Ewing lives in elegant style. She has everything, so far as fortune goes, that she can reasonably desire. But she finds that life still has its troubles. Happily she learned the valuable lesson that a cheerful, contented spirit can discharge its duties, however monotonous, without ever fading them tiresome.

Lord Londale gave his wife a fan which is the talk of London. It is large enough to screen not only the face, but the whole figure down to the waist, and composed of more than fifty ostrich feather tips, and of matches of quality and color, superbly mounted on sticks of tortoiseshell. On the outside stick is the monogram of Lady Londale, by her command, by her command, both gems of workmanship, in diamonds and pearls.
There has been much speculation over the probable use that will be made of the main building of the Victoria exhibition at Philadelphia, which was bought at auction recently for $97,000. It is now stated on good authority that it is to be divided between the Vauxhall and New Jersey Central railroad companies, and used by them for depots, car shops, etc.

FOOTBALL.

THE WASHINGTON REGATTA. Crews and scullers are arriving at Washington to take part in the forthcoming regatta of the National association of amateur rowers. By September 1st more than 150 rowers will be in active training upon the river. The prizes offered are valued at $1000.

THE CITIZENS' REGATTA.

A meeting of the above committee was held in their rooms, 41 King street, last evening to complete arrangements for the coming regatta. No more entries have been received for the single sculls, the number at present being 23. A crew consisting of Elliott, bow; Ramsay, 2; J. Scholtes, 3; Wier, stroke, was entered yesterday. Leos, Weisberger, Hosmer, and Hanlan or Ten Eyck will also start in the fours. It is expected that when the oarsmen arrive several other crews will be got together. The following are the oarsmen at present here: Hanlan, Trickett, O'Leary, Elliott, Wier, Leos, Weisberger and Riley, the latter having arrived yesterday. Haman and Conley, the Halifax crew, are expected to-day, and the long list of entries will probably answer the roll call before the end of the present week. The races are to be held in boats, the winners of the first to compete in the final. The course will be from Gooderham's to the Queen's wharf. The arrangement as to police protection was upon discussion left over to the course committee, with the assistance of Chief Draper. Boat accommodation was next discussed, but it was laid over till the meeting to be held this evening. It appears that the committee are meeting with determined resistance from the Victoria boat company, who are endeavoring to monopolize all the boats at disposal. It is also stated that having obtained sole right to land passengers at the exhibition wharf, the latter propose not to allow the regatta boats to touch there.
