a small table that can easily be moved to a window. Comfortable chairs and an open fire, and, above all, plenty of light.

The two characteristics of a bedroom should be freshness and restfulness. Let there be nothing that can fatigue the eye by its complexity, sun, if possible, and have a light, clean and cheerful style of furnishing. The bed should be so placed that one can have air without a draught, and the dressing table where the light will fall on the person dressing. A soft rug and a little table with a few books beside the bed, a low easy chair, a light straight chair before the dressing table, and a chest of drawers.

In the dining-room it is towards the table that our attention is chiefly directed. The table and sideboard sufficiently decorate the room, and there is no need of small ornaments. A cupboard with china and glass and the cups hung in rows is always attractive. In addition to the sideboard there should a serving table, placed near the pantry door, for convenience in serving. As a rule, colors of medium depth are more effective than pale colors, as here again they make better backgrounds for the table and the ladies' dresses. There is an idea that pictures of food are suitable for a dining-room, but it seems to me that dead game and dead fish are not appetizing even in pictorial form.

Evening is for most of us our time of leisure in which we enjoy our homes, and attractive lighting adds much to their beauty. When furnaces were invented and fireplaces were given up the register did not quite take the place of the family hearth; so the fireplace came back to stay, for purely artistic and sentimental reasons.

It is the same with lamps and candles. We cannot gather around the evening chandelier.

Of gas I have nothing to say, except that it burns up the air, often smells, kills plants, and flickers, and if it is in a bad place in the room it cannot be changed at will, while a lamp can be moved about. A lamp on a table not only has the advantage of being better to read by, but it leaves the ends and corners of the room a little mysterious and in shadow and so makes it seem larger.

The people whose homes are lighted by electricity, who do not subdue it, but live in a blaze of light which penetrates every crack, assure you that it is not any brighter than sunlight, and forget that sunlight comes from outdoors and from above. The ceiling and upper part of the room are at least in shadow, and as generally the windows are only on one side of a room, the wall on the window side is also in shadow.
