

In conclusion, any Canada/U.S. discussions on intellectual property must revolve around the inherent conflict between the interests of the U.S., as the owner of a very large share of intellectual property rights in this country, and the interests of Canada, which owns only a small share.