

	PAGE		PAGE
Our sympathies with the general emotions depend upon constitutional differences, . . .	460	Stewart's enumeration, . . .	464
Sympathy with the aspects of nature, . . .	461	Dr. Brown's enumeration, . . .	464
Generosity, or kindness, and gratitude, . . .	462	Desire more properly considered as one of the states of our mental constitution, and any object the object of desire as it yields pleasure, or confers happiness or good, . . .	464
Desire, . . .	464	Transition from the emotional to the moral part of our nature, . . .	467
Dr. Reid's enumeration of the desires, . . .	464
 THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE MORAL NATURE.
Peculiarity in the moral nature as distinguished from the phenomenal—the practical reason as distinguished from the speculative, . . .	473	The law of right in its different applications, . . .	504
Facts of the moral nature ultimate, . . .	479	Kant's view of the law of right or of duty, . . .	507
The proper question in regard to the moral nature, or in a theory of morals, . . .	482	Error of Kant, . . .	509
The confusion that has arisen from the commingling of different questions, and treating them as one, . . .	483	Distinction drawn by Kant between the moral law as a "law of holiness to the Supreme Being," and a "law of duty to every finite intelligent," . . .	512
Right and wrong, . . .	486	Incorrect idea in respect to duty as obedience to law the foundation of this distinction, . . .	512
A relation appreciable by reason, . . .	489	Source of Kant's Error, . . .	514
Yet no reason can be assigned for rightness or wrongness: the relation ultimate, . . .	490	Moral approbation and disapprobation, . . .	516
The perception of the relation accompanied with an emotion, . . .	490	The moral faculty, or conscience, . . .	524
The relation not only the object of perception by a percipient agent, but of moral approbation by a moral agent, . . .	490	The power of this principle, . . .	528
The relation intrinsic, eternal, and not created or constituted, . . .	491	Its influence upon other states, mental and emotional, . . .	529
The law founded on this relation, though eternal and immutable in itself, still in a high sense the law of God, . . .	493	The relation of conscience to the other principles of our nature, and to action, . . .	530
Reasons for the promulgation of the law as a command, . . .	497	The desires as principles of action, . . .	532
The law of right is one, . . .	500	The relation of emotion to desire, . . .	533
The law of right as respects the Decalogue, . . .	503	The emotions divided into primary and secondary, . . .	534
		The philosophy of this questionable, . . .	534
		The desires secondary to the emotions, . . .	535
		The general sources of the desires, . . .	536
		Fear the nearest antagonistic state to desire, . . .	536