BRITAIN IN EGYPT. Last week saw the British occupation of Egypt pass from the position of tacit to acknowledged permanence. The whole history of it is a curious exemplification of the manner in which without conscious endeavor and even against the expressed determination of her responsible government, Britain's empire and spheres of influence grow. Egypt has always been one of the prizes of the world, not so much for itself but on account of its commanding situation as the half-way house on the way to India. If this was true all thru the centuries, and when Napoleon declared to his troops as they stood in the shadow of the pyramids that "forty centuries looked down upon them." it is much more true to-day. And not the least notable circumstance about the changed conditions is that both the great canal highways to the east have definitely come under the control of the Anglo-Saxon peoples. There is little wonder that France
