"I understand neither your words nor your behavior!" I said icily, rising from my chair and stepping quickly to one side. "If you do not care to believe what I have told you I have nothing more to say. And if you will kindly excuse me I will go back to my room."

Dicky's face whitened, and there came into his eyes something which I had never seen before, a sort of deadly coldness, utterly foreign to his usual rages.

But my husband's white face, his coldly wrathful eyes effectually precluded any idea of mirth, even though his threat was childish melodrama.

"That rests with you," I told him stiffly. "I shall follow your cue whatever it may be."
I waited for no further answer, but walked out of the door. I had gone but a step or two before I heard the rustle and indignation.

Ranger looked anxious, but he didn't like fish, and he was hungry. But William never forgot Ranger, and soon he pulled out of his pocket a bone.

I knew very well that his pride would prevent him from carrying out the threat he had made. He would never endure Katie's wide-eyed amazement Jim's furtive looks, my father's silent disapproval, his mother's voluble and caustic criticism of the course he had outlined for us.

But, on the other hand, I knew that his stubborness would keep him from receding in any way from the ultimatum he had given me. There would be but one thing that he could do.
