"I am very glad," said Mr. Wyville, gravely; "I wish to make some inquiries about the case of murder that occurred Officer Lodge, the kindliness of his fem ine heart speaking in his saddened tone; "I know all about it. It was me as duty, sir." "Can we not sit down sor alk it over ?" asked Mr. Wyville. "At the hinn, sir, certingly," replied Officer Lodge; "and a good glass a' hale you can 'ave, too, sir."

They were soon seated in a little room nd each had his "glass a' hale" before Officer Lodge told the story like a man who had often told it before; all the angles were rounded, and the dramatic points were brought out with melodramatic emphasis. Mr. Wyville let him run on till he had no more to say. "And this strange woman, who came to the village on the morning of the mur ler, he said, when he had heard all; "this woman who was Draper's first wife — has she never been heard of since?" "O, Harriet Draper, bless you, yessir," said Officer Lodge; "she comes back pe odical, and gets into quod -parding me

"What does she do?" asked Mr. Wy. "Well, she's a bad 'un. We don't know where she comes from, nor where she goes to. She drinks 'eavy. and then she goes down there near Draper's 'ouse and the other 'ouse, 'an she kicks up a muss of crying and shouting. She doe t periodical, and we has to lock her up. "When was she here last?" asked Mr Officer Lodge pulled out a leather-covered pass-book, and examined it. "She's out of her reg'lar horder, this time," he said, "she 'aven't heen 'ere for a year. But I heerd of her later than that is the applications at Lincaped." the penitentiary at Liverpool." Mr. Wyville asked no more quest He wrote an address on a card, an handed it to Officer Lodge.

"If this woman return here," he said "or if you find out where she is, write t that address, and you shall be well re "Head Office of Police, Scotland Yard

London," read Officer Lodge from the card. "Yessir, I'll do it. O, no, none of that," he said, firmly, putting back some offering in Mr. Wyville's hand, "I'm in your debt, sir; I was a'most going to make a fool of myself with that bar'l. I'm bliged to you, sir; and I'll do this all the etter for remembering of your kind-Mr. Wyville took a friendly leave of good-natured Officer Lodge, and returned to Liverpool by the next train. Arrived there, he did not proceed straight to his hotel, but drove to the city penitentiary, where he repeated his inquiries about Harriet Draper; but he only learned that she had been discharged eight months Neither police nor prison-books could give him further information. Disappointed and saddened, next day he re urned to London.

Sister Cecilia visited Alice Walmsley every day for several weeks, until the happy change in the latter's life had grown out of its strangeness. Their in-

For the first month or so, the kind and wise little nun had conversed on any-thing that chanced for a topic; but after-wards they developed the silent system —and it was the better of the two. Sister Cecilia used to enter with a cheery smile, which Alice returned. Then Sister Cecilia would throw crumbs on the sill for the sparrows, Alice watching her, still smiling. Then the little Sister would seat herself on the pallet,

and take out her rosary, and smilingly shake her finger at Alice, as if to say:

"Now, Alice, be a good girl, and don't disturb me."

And Alice, made happy by the sweet companionship, would settle to her sew-ing, hearing the birds twitter and chirp, and seeing the golden sunlight pour through the bars into her cell. Sister Cecilia had a great many prayers to say every day, and she made a rule of saying the whole of them in Alice's cell.

The change in Alice's life became known to all the officials in the prison, and a general interest was awakened in the visits of the good Sister to her cell. source of pleasure and a subject of every day comment.

But there was one official who beheld all this with displeasure and daily in-creasing distrust. This was Mr. Haggett the Scripture-reader of the prison.
