A Planet Reporter Tries To Work Off A Plugged Coin
But Fails

A UNIQUE EXPERIENCE

Bad money is like a borrowing friend—it's hard to get rid of. This is no idle philosophy, but is based on fact.

Recently some designing person passed off a plugged 50-cent piece on a Planet reporter. Needless to say, the deed was committed after nightfall, when the alert vision of the reporter was for a disadvantage. Next day, while making a rapid inventory of his financial standing, the reporter became aware to the fact that he had been "worked." The coin had evidently at some time fallen into the hands of some idle person, who for want of something better to do, had drilled a neat little hole in the top of it, and then plugged the opening up with lead.

The victim was a believer in the adage that all things come to him who waits, so he decided to bide his time, and on the first opportunity do somebody as he had been done by.

That same evening a friend called in on the reporter. He coughed nervously once or twice and then asked if he could borrow a dollar.

"No," came the reply, "but I can lend you fifty cents."

"That will do," answered the friend, and as he went off with the bad piece of money in his pocket, the newspaper man gave vent to a chuckle of satisfaction.

But let the next morning the friend called again with the fifty cents in his outstretched hand.

"Couldn't spend your money," he observed. "It was simply no good last night."

The coin next made its appearance in Zakoor's store.

"Give me a package of Meerschaum," said The Planet man as he gently laid the Jonah fifty cent piece in Mr. Zakoor's well-developed palm.

"That's plugged," came the disappointing announcement from the dealer. "Can't tag it."

The coin was then taken to Bennett's cigar store. Mr. Bennett was at the rear of the store, but had no sooner sprung the cash register for the purchased amount before he got next.

"Sorry," he said, "but I can't take it."

The reporter then thought, for variety, it would be a good idea to try to work the bad piece off on a bank clerk. So he called on the teller at the Merchants' Bank.

The teller, however, was on. Those gentlemen of the banks seem to be almost able to smell bad money.

"It is a plugged fifty cent piece worth?" he was asked.

"It is worth just its weight in silver," he replied. "That piece you have is pretty well worn, and would not be worth more than 14 cents."

Will C. Hart, who was standing nearby, remarked that it was only in border towns that plugged money was refused.

"Down east," he said, "you will run across lots of plugged money. They don't refuse it anywhere there."

He advised the scribe to go east and spend his fifty cents.

A. I. McCall came to the counter, when the reporter dropped in there and called for twenty-five one-cent stamps.

"I thought you were up to some mischief," he remarked, as he handed back the coin that had adopted a man.

"That piece of money is plugged,"

Ross Hicklin, of Sheldrick's tailoring establishment, was asked to change the coin, but it was the same old story; Ross had received plugged ones before, and he didn't intend to be bitten in the same place twice.

These possessor of the plugged money then decided to do something desperate. So he went in and tried to work Roy Brisco.

"Change fifty cents," said Roy. "Why, certainly, old man, do anything to please you."

Roy didn't appear to notice that there was anything wrong with the fifty cent piece, so the reporter picked up his change and walked rapidly out.

On reaching the street he thought he would have another look at his change.

What! Done again? It could not be!

But it was.

The glittering quarters which lay in the reporter's hand were both plugged!
