A WOMAN'S LIFE OF CRIME.

best partners of life? Emerson says:
"It is not beauty that inspires the deepest passion," and Jean Paul Richter declared that he would not lead a weman into the matrimonial noose whom it would not delight to hear him read the learned reviews of Gottingen or the universal German library when the counded his praise though it The oldest professional sneak thief in the country has again been arrested. And she is a woman. Sixty-nine years ago she began the criminal career which she still pursues, and yet, strange to say, she bears upon her features but little traces of the life she led. Of the four score years that have passed over her head more than forty have been passed in prison. During that time all sunshine that came to her was will regarded the institution of marriage in its highest aim and aspect as "union of two persons of cultivated facultics, indentical in opinion and purposes between whom there exists that best kind of equality, similarity of powers with reciprocal superiority in them, so that one can enjoy the luxury of looking up to the other and can have alternately the pleasure of lea'ing and being led in the path of development."

Mary was only 11 years of ago when she first was brought before the courts, and had to be held up in the arms of the sergeant so that the judge could see her and hear the little story she had to tell. She had no excuse to offer them. Indeed through her whole capter she has never had. Stealing has seemed to be as natural to her as living, the only variation in her conduct before the authorities being that she would occasionally claim identity with some other well known in criminal.
