During a brief residence in camp Mr. Cartwright had briefly expressed his contempt and loathing for any and all courts, and illustrated these views in a number of little episodes that marked his erratic career. In a difference of opinion in a four-handed game of poker at the Miners' Rest saloon he had thrown one of the players out of the window, knocked another down stairs, and compromised with the third by appropriating the entire stakes to his own uses. On another occasion Jean Duprez, a big French freighter, iffs posse enforced the order. Cartwright came to town full of rage and a kind of incredulous amazement, and a horly afterwards, with whiskey. In this condition he made several gory threats, and was promptly placed under bonds by Fisher to keep the peace. After these were given with great difficulty, for everybody believed that he would instantly commit someded of violence, he made no more threats, but sat for a long time in gloomy silence. For the first time he had realized the strong arm of the law; then he surprised his admirers by remarking, with an oath, that he guessed he'd try the courts awhile himself. Out of this sprang a litigation in the word in the work in the work in gloot the time in guessed he'd try the courts awhile himself. This, in turn, wound upwards and ever upwards above the timber line into the ancient snow and never-melting mists, now a crooked streak, now a line and then the descent began. An hour more and he stood on the zigzag trail; half a mile down the slope directly below him he saw the lights of the cabin window, and paused, with a murderous gleam in his eyes, to look at the locks of his Winchester.

The moon by this time was riding high and turned the snow-field above.

Finally, at noon December 24 just before adjourning for the holidays, the cause was decided, awarding the mineral land to John Fisher and placing William Cartwright just fourteen feet on the wrong side of competency.

Cartwright was at the bar of the Gem saloon when they brought him the news. For an instant he stood still, breathing hard, and deep, black lines seemed to grow across his forehead. Then all the brute in him burst forth.

BILL CARTWRIGHT'S CLAIM.

When Bill Cartwright struck ore in the "Josie" lode, and John Fisher of the "Black Bess" adjoining had the temerity to claim that the drift or tunnel which tapped the mineral extended over the line and the deposit, therefore, belonged to him, everybody in Leadville predicted trouble.

Lasted Whiskey into his face, "what a browledge are you looking at?"

Then wheeling around, he called out to the bartender: "Ed., lend me your snow-shoes."

That worthy did not consider it advisable to decline, and sent a boy to his room after them, while Cartwright rushed out of doors. In a short time he returned for the shoes, carrying his Winchester repeating rifle in his hand, and as he was slinging them over his shoulder, the bartender, who was really a kind-hearted fellow, ventured to ask what he was going to do.

"I'm going to run that infernal thief off the claim," replied Cartwright, whose rage had been succeeded by brutal coolness that spoke his intent of doing exactly what he said.

On another occasion Jean Duprez, a big French freighter, disputed one of his statements, and in the discussion that followed Mr Cartwright stamped him barbarously and carried away an ear as a trophy. The fact that Mme Duprez was present and screamed continuously during the enignagement did not soften his heart nor stay his hand.

Big-boned, heavy-featured, course of speech, brutal when aroused and morose when at rest, of buildog courage, of passionate nature and unforgiving memory, the people of the camp tolerated him by letting him alone. In view of these facts Fisher's friends were appalled at his suicidal temerity and urged him to withdraw his demand. That gentleman replied tersely that he was right and would not be buillied.
