Shipwreck That Led to Fortune.

HISTORY OF THE HOUSE OF BASS.

From time immemorial Burton-on-Trent has been famous for its ale. Readers of Sir Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe" may remember a reference to Burton ale at the time of the Crusades. It was only during the last one hundred and fifty years, however, that the town has developed a world-wide reputation as the centre of the brewing trade; the story of the development providing a romance of business unique in the trade history of the country.

A BLESSING IN DISGUISE.
During the reign of George III. a man named Panton started a brewery in Burton-on-Trent and engaged three men. At the time of the American War of Independence the owner of a carrying business saw the possibilities of the brewing industry in Burton, and decided it would pay him to start a brewing business himself instead of carrying beer for Panton.

This man was William Bass, who began business as a brewer in 1777, and laid the foundations of a brewery which has no equal by supplying a good pale, amber, or brown ale, at his customers' night's rest.

About half a century ago the annual output amounted to 3,000 barrels, half of which was consumed locally. The remainder was dispatched either by river or canal to various parts, and no small quantity found its way to Baltic ports, where it met with a ready market. Ultimately, however, the Russian Government imposed a prohibitive tariff which practically destroyed trade in that quarter.

It proved to be a blessing in disguise however, for William Bass started to brew ale to suit the climate of the East.

It was 1828 that the manufacture of this pale ale was started. This was originally intended for the Indian market alone; hence the familiar name, "East India Pale Ale." Curious circumstances, however, destined the beverage to be sold in this country. As a result of a wreck in the Irish Channel of a vessel containing 300 hogheads of the ale, a quantity was sold, amongst other salvage, for the benefit of the underwriters. The quantity was so much appreciated that in a short time a demand sprang up through the country for India Pale Ale.

Then came the great impetus. The Midland Railway was opened in 1825, and the business of Bass began its career of unbroken success. At that time the trade amounted to 60,000 barrels per annum. A second brewery was erected to cope with the demand, and ten years later, the business of the company having increased to 400,000 barrels per annum, a third brewery was built.

KING EDWARD'S BREW.

The characteristic enterprise of the firm is illustrated by the story of the red triangle—the trade mark which appears on every bottle of Bass. The label was devised by an employee in the London agency, and stands first on the Trade Mark Register. This proud position was secured by a representative of the firm, who kept watch through the night on the steps of the registrar's office when the English Trade Marks Act came into operation in 1875.

It is a popular fallacy to attribute the distinctive quality of Burton brewed beer to the excellence of the Trent water. As a matter of fact, river water never enters into the numerous processes in the brewing of beer. The actual water is obtained from a series of wells impregnated with gypsum, and is responsible for the unequalled keeping qualities and clarity of the Burton product.

There is one event in the modern history of the firm which is often recalled with interest. In 1902, whilst King Edward was visiting Lord Burton, he inspected Bass and Co's breweries. At the New Brewery he pulled over levers which started a special mash for a large brew of extra strong ale, which will for a long time to come be known as the "King's Ale."

Little did William Bass dream, when he began business as a one-man brewer, that before a century had passed the name of "Bass" would be a household word in every part of the civilized world, and that the manufacture of the famous pale ale would give employment to thousands of workers in one town.—T.H.B.
