Three Systems Were Taught extends for sighting purposes. The opthe Troops by Experienced Instructors.

Perhaps the most interesting feature ly facing the station, but is supported of the camp on Carling's Heights, which closed today, was the work done by the signaling corps. Scientific signaling is yet comparatively new to the Canadian army, and is not well understood by the general public, although it is one of the most important branches of the imperial army ser-vice. Sergt.-Major McGowan, of the Second Life Guards, London, England, put the signaling corps of No. 1 Brigade through their paces on Carling's Heights yesterday morning, and most of the men showed up well. The ser-geant was sent out by the imperial authorities to give instructions in signal work to the Canadian army, and, as will be remembered, he spent several weeks at Wolseley Barracks during the vinter for this purpose.

The members of the R. C. R. so instructed were engaged in passing on their knowledge to the volunteers during camp, and will continue their work traversed by these heliograph signals. throughout the next camp. The value of scientific signaling was brought home to the Canadians during the South African war, when the contingents from the Dominion found hemselves handicapped by not having signal corps, such as were possessed the English regiments. Signaling is of three kinds, of which that done by means of flags is the simplest. In with the heliograph, but the distance military parlance this is known as semaphore signaling. Each man

The flag signals can be read at a distance of three miles with the aid of field glasses.

A more elaborate and more effective in command of the signal corps, learner method of signaling is by means of the system in the South African war. the heliograph. This consists of a small circular lens set upon a fixture, which allows the operator to turn the

When the lever is released by the hand, the glass flies back into po sition, so that a "dash" is produced by holding the lever down longer than for a "dot." Since light glances off from a reflecting surface at the same angle at which it strikes, the glass may be so moved that no matter where the sun may be, its rays may be caught and reflected in the desired direction, the hole in the center of the glass always facing in the same direction.

The distance of 160 miles has been signal corps of the late camp found it easy to send heliographs from Springbank to the heights, and return. The third way of signaling is by lamps, and it is used when it is too dark either for flags or lens. A small, movable shutter in front of the permits of the formation of the dots and dashes. The same code is used as covered is, of course, much smaller. One great feature of the latter tw methods of signaling is that the rays cast by the lens and the lamp are narrow that a signal cannot be intercepted except by someone standing al nost directly in line between the two signaling stations, and as these are always the highest points that car In enemy to catch the signal is small.
