stubborn stand in Metemneh. They are so advisable to await reinforcements before assaulting the stronghold. When the reinforcements reach Gubat Stewart's army will endeavor to take Metemneh by storm. The action of the troops afterwards will largely depend upon General Gordon. Wolseley's plan is to have the garrison at Khartoum brought down the Nile in s camers to Metemneh as soon as the British have secured its occupation. This would protically effect the object of the expediever, that Gorden, when success has crowned the handiwork of the expedition, crowned the handiwork of the expedition, may positively refuse to be relieved or to allow his faithful garrison to go. There are reasons for believing that he will insist on remaining at Khartoum and establishing a government there. If he does, Sewards forces will be pushed forward and will attack the mahdi at Ondurman. The last host containing and
