

Having thus exhibited the peculiar advantages possessed by the infant Island of Cape Breton, and discharged my duty to Society, I shall conclude the present subject, requesting to remind the indulgent reader, that notwithstanding what has been said, it is not every individual, who arrives as a settler on the Island, that is sure to be happily and independently settled, for there are a few examples to the contrary; but these may be traced to the abuses of a kind country, and appear to be the punishment of indolence and vice; and only tend to prove, that virtuous industry alone will insure happiness with riches.