The work of a reader to a publishing house is no bagatelle. One of these toilers has just waded through a manuscript of two hundred thousand words, written by a Tribune editor. Another house has just sent back to the author a novel of one hundred and seventy-five thousand words, asking him to cut out seventy-five thousand words, asking him to cut out seventy-five thousand before they can consider it.

The work of a reader to a publishing for the consequences of which are that competition has reduced the average profits on merchandise to a very fine point. While this, of itself, has been somewhat against the interests of the saint John merchants, it has been of general benefit to the provinces at large. They now recognise that the old system of large profits and long credits has passed away. The struggle with outside competition has been a severe one, and they are at one time held exclusively by the merchants of which are that competition has reduced the average profits on merchandise to a very fine point.
