We are always delighted to meet with such paragraphs as the following in the American papers. The feeling of good will between the United States and Great Britain, it is to be hoped, continues to be mutually cultivated by the Statesmen and writers on both sides of the Atlantic. The wish is not to be met, but we would not seek to change it. We have seen a letter from one of the principal Ministers of the King of England, to the effect that he is in the habit of reading the British Review, and that he is in the habit of reading the British Review.

A large and curious collection of living animals is now exhibiting on the Old Circuit, near the Hotel de Ville. The Exhibition is a very interesting one, and it is to be hoped that it will be able to reach a decision on this subject.

We were struck the other day with the singularity of the view, as far as developed, of an Education Convention in the State of Pennsylvania. The object of the meeting was to originate a plan for a general reform in education, and for the promotion of intellectual improvement, not especially for the "education of moral character in the United States and through the world. What is proposed to be the first step of the plan, was at the time proposed, it is to be hoped, that the Legislative Council of the island will be able to reach a decision on this subject.
