It is generally allowed that Lord Macaulay has worked a new era in English style. As an essayist he certainly writes clearly and well. Yet, it was too much practice to say that the essay now before us can fairly bear comparison with any he wrote. The specimens already given ought to suffice as proof of this, but more be required in honor of the subject, for happy allusion, for logical sequence, for clear ideas and energy and harmony of expression, we think Macaulay is fairly left behind. Our essayist is passing from what he said of the Dark Ages and of Ireland to the medieval cycle, which he happily calls the heroic age, and he is now to the subject of the Virgin Mother of God. Her beauty was celebrated by the harp of the minstrel, and by the reverence, partly in honor of her native charms, and partly in remembrance of the Virgin Mother of God. Dr. H. J. Forsyth, St. Peter's, C. Art and Religion.
We are only too glad to be able to reproduce in our columns the following interesting and just comments of an Irish contemporary, the Mayo Examiner, of Castlebar:

The Catholic Review is confessedly the ablest and most interesting religious journal published in America. It has the rare honor of being supported by the best talent in that country and in Europe. In a recent issue of this distinguished magazine appeared another interesting and singularly able article, "Art and Religion," by Peter L. Fay, of St. Louis.

A few days ago we had the honor of being visited by a learned and interesting friend to read this article, and, indeed, happy to have to confess that we have been charmed with the feast. We can safely say that any person who can read this article with delight and profit; while to the student who knows enough of the subject, and of history in general, to grasp the full meaning of the writer; it is no exaggeration to say that it is a gem of rare merit—a very masterpiece of composition and genius.

This happy, though short quotation is so aptly and so judiciously interpreted, not only to illustrate and adorn the subject, but also to show, what indeed they were never intended to show, the wide course of political literature in which the gifted and accomplished author has indulged.

His essay is, indeed, a valuable production. It gives us, though more or less implicitly, a full and precise account of the rise, the development, the perfection, and the decay of the Fine Arts. These, we all know, rose out of religion. There seems to be a natural connection between the two, and in reference to this relation Miracles, Angelo, as we are told in the essay, once said, "that to represent Our Lord it is not only necessary for the artist to be a man of genius, but also a holy man, so that he may be inspired by the Holy Ghost." If we remember right the main object of the essay is to show that not only Miracles, but also the Fine Arts, are a natural evolution of the religious spirit, and that the religious spirit, in its turn, is a natural evolution of the religious spirit.

The religion of Jesus brought forth the highest of the human race, and was gradually being led to higher and higher perfection by that divine inspiration, and that the sole cause of its progressive decline and degradation since the days of Jesus, is a natural evolution of the religious spirit, and that the religious spirit, in its turn, is a natural evolution of the religious spirit.

stationary enterprise and miracle. The development on the aesthetic side was naturally commensurate with the development on the religious side.

THE PARNELL COMMISSION.
The Parnell Commission resumed its sittings on the 25th Nov. at the residence of the Attorney-General, Mr. Webb, in the County Kerry. He called the judges' attention to an article in the Kerry Sentinel (Edward Harrington's paper), which stated the judges composing the Parnell Commission were showing signs of weakness now through the opening of the enquiry they had appeared to be so strong. The judges were the creature of a conspiracy entered into by the government and the Press, and were manifestly unable to do justice. The Attorney-General appeared to the court to take action in the matter, as such publications tended to defeat justice, and amounted to the grossest contempt.

Mr. Reid, on behalf of Mr. Harrington, contended that no notice of a charge of this character had been given them, and it was absolutely impossible to make an answer at present. He asked that the matter be adjourned until to-morrow.

President Justice Hannan and the Attorney-General both agreed that the matter should be adjourned until to-morrow.

The examination of witnesses was then resumed.

Witnesses from Kerry were examined, all of whom attributed the outrage in that county to the instigation of the League. A laborer named Williams testified that he had been fired at by the captain of the moonlighters, and a placard had been posted on the wall of his house, offering a reward of £500 to anyone who would shoot him and his employer, who had taken an evasive answer.

On cross-examination some of the witnesses succeeded in connecting the League with the outrage in Kerry.

held that the creation of a present proprietary was the only means and the Irish party was always ready and eager to assist in settlement of the bill was due to the knowledge that it would secure a title to the enclosure without effecting its ostensible object. The government had not taken up the land question with a view to helping the tenants but at the satisfaction of the landlords, who, seeing they could not acquire the land, naturally wanted to dispose of their property at inflated prices. (Hear, hear.) Consented and not read twice would not be touched under the bill and arrears ought to be considered along with the rest, not otherwise the land purchase arrangements would be futile. The bill would not admit that the present settlement was a failure. The positive character of national sentiment was not merely an agrarian question; it was that of a national aspiration. If the government meant to do anything for the people, it should first insure provision dealing with arrears, the tenant's distress, and the security for advances was not the manner and the legislature would give its reward in the conclusion of the people.

The bill passed the second reading 229 to 225.

In the Commons on the 23rd, on motion to go into committee on the bill, Mr. Russell proposed an amendment giving the government power to instruct the commission to deal with arrears when they were in arrears in view of the fact that it was agreed on all sides that the arrears question must necessarily be treated in an independent manner, and without delay in conjunction with the question of land purchase. This would place the bill in a position to be treated as a separate measure, and the arrears question would be dealt with as a separate measure, and the arrears question would be dealt with as a separate measure.

Mr. Smith contended
