istration. He traced the rise and decline of the Theory of the Divine Right of Kings, and the growth of Par-Gamentary Government. He drew a sharp contrast between the days of ighty years ago, when Parliament was controlled by a few governing families and to-day when democracy lominates parliament, and showed that as the sway of democracy increased, the respect for and loyalty to the Crown had increased. In 1830 the Premier the Duke of Wellington kent the King out of his own capital, fearing his life was not safe. To-day, in the days of democracy, the King is acclaimed by thronging thousands when he visits his capital. He also cited Mr. Balfour's statement that King Edward's personality had done what ministers, ambassadors and protocols had failed to do, bringing about an understanding with France which had made the settlement of the French Shore question possible. He illuminated his points with telling anecdotes and the whole subject was reated in a fascinating manner. A warm tribute was paid to the late Queen Victoria, King Edward and our present King George whose relations with his subjects was of a patriotic character that could not fail to ontribute to the greater glory of the Empire and the general peace of the world. The Daily News says of the cture:-"The discourse was one of the
