More Points on-the Mysterious Death of a

NEW HAVES, Conn., May 23.—The prosecution in the Malley case rested this Revere.

Alex. Jacques (the "Old Man"), press agent of the United States circus, is at the Revere. forenoon after hearing Justice Metcalfe and recalling Dr. Painter, who said that he heard Jas. Malley testify before the jury at for East York. the inquest that his father on August 6 were you on Friday night?" No, "Its a good thing you were home last Friday night." He corrected himself after saying : "Where were you on Friday night?" Judge Metcalfe, who held the inquest on the body of Jennie Cramer, corroborated Painter's testimony. Seven lawyers for the defence held a consultation. Blindenbergh stated that they concluded to make no opening, but leave their story to the testimony of the witnesses.

The names of the Malley boys, who are on trial at New Haven for the mysterious murder of Jennie Cramer at Savin rock, have become household words. The mys-tery which shrouds the insensational uncertainty intensifies public interest in the boys, and owing to their previous good character and their kind public treatment of Jennie Cramer gives the trial some of the elements bordering on heroism, for there are many who believe the minocent of any wil set toward the dead girl evil act toward the dead girl.

The Malleys, James and Walter, were among the flashiest of in their native city of New Haven. The boys are cousins and highly connected. They were afforded every educational advantage, and Walter being of a studious turn of mind, improved the opportunities and became somewhat noted in the vizinity of his native heath for his scholarly attainments. James' mind ran rather to business than to books, and he became manager of his father's large store at New Haven.

Wealthy, accomplished, of good family connection, and not bad looking, they became popular beaux of New Haven, and moved in society creme de la creme of the city, Marriageable belles vied with each other for their company, mothers manceuvered for them, and prospective fathers-in-law, after mentally calculating the boys' bank accounts and looking over their hydrogen prospective were very their other for their company, mothers manceuvered for them, and prospective fathers-in-law, after mentally calculating the boys' bank accounts and looking over their business prospects, were wont to admit that the Malleys were quite a "catch." These two young men while in the gay whirl of New Haven society met, and meeting, admired, Jennie Cramer, the handsomest girl of the city. She was not their equal in society, but her great beauty partially opened to her the doors of wealth and fashion. THE THEORY OF THE DEFENSE.

testimony of this trial has defeated that defense, and must necessarily drive the prisoners' lawyers to stand firmly on the theory of suicide. To do this successfully a most damning admission must be made, viz: that they accomplished Jennie's ruin, and in the despair of remorse she partock of Blanche Douglass' poison and then threw herself (into the sea. A weak attempt might be made to show that Jennie Cramer was, like Blanche Douglass, a victim of the arsenic habit, but the fact that the arsenic when continuously used in small quantities thoroughly and evenly permeates the system would break evenly permeates the system would break this down, as it was only found in the three organs of Jennie's body heretofore mentioned, and there in sufficient quantities to produce death. Blanche, the enigma. The hope that Blanche Douglass would turn state's evidence is dispelled by the prosecution putting in evidence stories of what she had agreed to confess. The boy ran back to the station and informed the officials on duty that some person had been killed on the track, and a party immediately proceeded up the line in search of the remains. The body was soon found. It was lying entirely nude alongside the track. It was so horribly mangled—one leg being off and the other torn to shreds, the head crushed in, and the body weth hardly a sound spot to be found on it—that at first it was not to be found on it—that at first it was not recognizable; but on closer examination the remains were identified as those of Michael Mohan, a freight conductor on the Grand Trunk railroad. The mangled remains were collected, together with the clothing which was scattered along the track, placed on a stretcher and conveyed to the station.
