THE CAYUGA INDIANS CLAIM.

A Buffalo Judge Says the Canada Indians Have no Right to the Honey.

BUFFALO, Aug. 5.—The claim of the Canadian branch of the Cayuga Indians, presented by their chief, O-Jag-geh-4, against the state of New York through Gen. James C. Strong of this city for $25,000, was argued in Albany last week before Justice Peckham, who just handed down his decision. This claim is based on the terms of a treaty made with the Cayugas at Fort Stanwix in 1790, and at Cayuga ferry in 1795, by which the chief, O-Jag-geh-4, of whom the claimant is a lineal descendant, ceded to the state large tracts of land on condition that the state should pay an annuity of $2,500 to the tribe forever. The tribe was then divided, a portion of it living in Canada and the other portion in this state. Up to the year of 1812 the annuity was divided between the two parts of the tribe, and the Canadian branch took up arms against the United States, and the money was subsequently paid to the New York branch, which had renounced its allegiance to the government. The Canadian Cayugas, however, having the original treaties and seal of the tribe in their possession, and being governed by a lineal descendant of O-Jag-geh-4, claimed to be the legal representatives of the tribe and entitled to their share of the annuity. The claim was laid before the commissioner of the land office, who rejected it. The Cayuga chief then placed the matter in the hands of Gen. Strong to try in the courts of the state. Judge Peckham's decision sustains the land commissioner's action in rejecting the claim. The case is to be appealed to the general term.

To one, Mary Babcock, he had been engaged, and she had proposed marriage and was accepted, knowing she had some $300 saved up. A short time ago he informed Miss Babcock that marriage with her or a suicide's grave were the two alternatives for him, whereupon they took the train for Detroit, Miss Babcock believing she was going to be married. Once there he suggested the advisability of her money being placed in his care, which was done. He started on a charge of McCoys, and was arrested at the residence of his father, Mr. Stanley of Ottawa.
