ment more ridiculous than these. The British people are intelligent and their acceptance of a law under the sign manual of their king is an exercise of judgment as commendable as the submission of the people of a republic to an enactment hacked and distorted by the play of political parties. The fact that the coming coronation will be conducted with such unanimous sanction from the people of the United Kingdom is the evidence indisputable that there is no thought that the rule of kings is undesirable. The masses are resting content in the belief that their interests are well served and their expression of admiration and reverence at this time are less the new expression of homage to a sovereign than the satisfaction they feel in the greatness of the empire to which they belong, and in the knowledge that under British laws the dominions of truth, liberty and justice have been established more widespread and with greater stability than under any other human agency.
