The Countess of Aberdeen, wife of the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, spent a few strenuous hours in this city sesterday. She arrived during the early hours on the G.P.R. special from Ottawa, where she had been the guest of Sir Wilfrid and Lady Laurier. As was rumored at the last minute, Miss Violet Asquith, daughter of Premier Asquith of Great Britain, did not accompany her.

Receptions

The reception which took place early in the day was provincial in its nature. Sir John and Lady Guston, as the representatives of the province, met her ladyship and conducted her to Government House, where sn, awaited the arrival of Dr. Hastogs, who subsequently conducted her the indepartment in the city hall.

The countess gave attention, and was apparently vitally interested in the M.O.H-6 private office, after which adjournment was made to the Miss Dykes, who explained the sphere of work of her staff of seven nurses. Special attention was given to the city hall and reported on. No Moral Support.

Mr. Guthrie, after arguing that Canada should make a beginning at once in the matter of shipbuilding and in the matter of organizing her own naval defence, alluded to the statement in the admiralty memorandum that the moral support of Canada would be the greatest possible assistance to the imperial government. The best of the moral support in voting this $35, Warning was served upon Germany that Great Britain would not be passed in the race for naval supremacy. The British Government took authority to build four additional dreadnoughts in case Germany continued land, which should be assigned to the two fleet units proposed by the Laurier amendments. The other vessels for these fleet units should be built in Canada and the whole navy should be under Canadian control. If there was any real emergency, he said, I would favor giving every man and every dollar to the defence of the empty. noughts in case Germany continued her excessive shipbuilding. It was by building four additional dreadnoughts in 1909 that Britain had met the Gerevery dollar to the defence of the empire. but there is no emergency, there is no peril, and we can now in perfect security agree upon and inaugurate a permanent policy of naval defence.

In 1909 that Britain had met the defence in 1909 that

Compromise is Possible.

He suggested that, in view of the lack of unanimity in the house, a compromise between the two parties might be possible. "We might modify our proposal." he continued, "and allow the two dreadnoughts to be constructed in England and then the rest of the two fleet units could be built in Canada in a short time. The British navy would be shorn of one dreadnought, but it would be strengthened by the support of two fleet units. Therefore, I suggest to the prime minister and to my right honorable leader that some give and some take might be possible.

Areadnoughts, Canada. (Applause.)

Recent Lessons.

Mr. Middlebro said the proposal to give three dreadnoughts, or their equivalent in money, was intended to meet an urgent and immediate need. The permanent policy of the government would be declared hereafter and would not be put into effect until it had been submitted to and approved by the people. Recent happenings in Europe had shown that a nation might be wiped off the map by military operations lasting but a few months. A reaval attack could be made much more quickly than attack by land, and if Britain and the empire were to be
