HELEN KELLER, THE WONDER GIRL

Madame Macerlinck recently visited Helen Keller. The following, quoted from Pictorial Review, gives a good idea of her remarkable impressions: (Courtesy of Pictorial Review) We are standing close together. Helen has not left the arm of her companion whose husband, a young American with a smile in his deep-set eyes, is standing, has now joined the group. Helen is tall and well-developed. She has a finely-shaped head and well-cut, regular features. Her nose is classically straight; the rather full mouth nobly curved; the chin small but firm; the eyes set in their deep sockets, blue, to screen a top-penetrating glance; and dominating all, a lofty brow, a high square forehead that attracts and holds the attention. It is because the eyes are lacking that the brow seems so much alive? Very clear, very smooth, with only a tiny furrow grooved in the centre by effort and study; it is indeed the sun of that countenance, bathing it with its radiance. You feel that, if you covered it, everything would grow dim. Encircling her brow is a black velvet ribbon, its edges prettily worked with very dainty steel beads. Her chestnut hair, dressed low down on the neck, is divided of wave or parting and drawn back into a tight knot behind. At the utmost, a softening touch may occasionally be given by a lock which has slipped the imperious ribbon and strayed on her temples; and yet this severe style suits her and, and when we study her profile and her rather masculine throat, straight and pure as a column, we are reminded of an Athenian youth on a bas-relief. Helen always holds herself very erect, almost to stiffness, and her dress is that of any other American girl who lives remote from the big centres. The full, gray cloth skirt and the blouse of em-until the second act did she dare lift her eyes in his direction. The very fixity of his gaze by some occult process made her feel it. What she saw was a face ghastly pale, lit by a pair of eyes piercing in their intensity. His hands fumbled with some object they held. Naturally she was frightened. She sang as an automaton cold perspiration starting under the grease paint on her forehead. Although she refused to look again, she felt the terror of those unflinching eyes. By degrees, as act followed act and nothing happened, she gained courage, dressing silently for each coming scene which, perhaps, might be her last, but disclaiming appeal for help which would mean the man's arrest, a scene, and consequent publicity. Nothing ever came of it and eventually the fair faded and her former sense of security returned.

The Passing of The "Hired Girl"

Telling What The Women's Clubs Have Done To Solve The Servant Girl Problem

(Courtesy of Pictorial Review). In the fifth "Hired House" article, Mrs. Mabel Potter Maggett tells many interesting facts concerning what this now famous body of women have accomplished. The following is quoted:— Is there anything so hard to get today as a servant girl? For the reason report that lists some 800 occupations now open to women. There used to be only one. Sometimes you entered it by the front door and sometimes you entered it by the back door. But whether as the mistress entering on matrimony or the maid entering on service, the duties to which the limiting conditions of your sex called you, were domestic labor. Even now in all this present day clamor about what women shall or shall not be permitted to do, the public is almost resentfully unanimous in agreement about the one occupation, that women's work whatever else it may be is housework. So of course it seems the more surprising that women won't do it. And they won't today, not if they get into any one of those 800 other occupations in which they may now make a living. It may be that the mothers ate sour grapes and the daughters' teeth are set on edge. At any rate, the ceaseless toil of housework, the work that was "never done" is a matter of historic record. The wife who worked without a wage was busy from sunrise to sunset and long after by the light of the evening lamp. So was the standard of industry set for the domestic help. Ten hours, twelve hours, even sometimes fourteen hours, the continuous round of duties held you. Labor unions have been organized against less hardship than that. Was it any wonder family life that women who could get away, walked out of the kitchen? The hired girl left us about a generation since. We have been wont to regard her going as a calamity. On the contrary it was a blessing in disguise. Her departure turned domestic drudgery into domestic science. It was as if the world awakened to the real menace in the danger of an altogether deserted kitchen. And every modern invention has been rushed to the aid of the housewife who remained behind. More than fifty per cent. of the women in the United States are doing their own work today. But they no longer have to get along with antiquated, outworn tools. See literally acres of cleverly devised, labor-saving utensils displayed by the department stores; No gonn of feign, tale ever worked greater wonders than electricity, the new servant in the house that washes and irons and sweeps and cooks at the touch of a button. And today any domestic operation that isn't easy to do at home, the factory will do for you. Relieved of her heavier burdens, the historic woman with the broom has been able to rest her hands and employ her head in a study of her problems. The result has been that an occupation hitherto more or less haphazard and chaotic, has been reorganized with efficient system. It was the Household Economics Department of the General Federation that taught it. Between 1906 and 1910, 1,000 women's organizations added that department to their club work, and thereby put themselves in direct contact with all the information available from specialists in chemistry and of culture, in architecture and decoration and every other subject pertaining to the household.
