BOSTON CROWDS TAKE TO HOCKEY

(Boston Herald) We are a few years behind our vigorous Canadian brethren in developing a fondness and a following for the game of hockey, just as we are a trifle slow in acquiring enthusiasm for lacrosse, but the hockeyites are surely making up for lost time. A promising game in Boston brings out a crowd of 5,000. If there were facilities for more, even if some of them had to hang on by nails and eyerolls to get a semi-occasional glimpse of a few square feet of ice, probably 10,000 or 15,000 would flock to the rink. The Harvard-Princeton contest of this week might be one of the great athletic events of the season if we had a skating building elastic enough to expand in stadium style. What is the lure of this game, so extremely popular for many years
