THE IRISH QUESTION.

Now, before proceeding further, I would like to define in a manner somewhat mathematical what the course of a nation, small in home territory, and depending on trade and manufacture, must be, so far as its outlying possessions are concerned. In the first place we may suppose it the centre of a ring of colonies. In this period it is strong; they are weak. Its people possess in a concerned. In the first place we may suppose it the centre of a ring of colonies. In this period it is strong; they are weak. Its people possess the are of intelligence; their are comparatively uncducated. At this period it may be for hundreds of years—the central country is able to dictate to the circle, and to direct the methods of their lives, the manner of their trade, and the groove of their aspirations. But this period passes; the outer points will make demands for self-free them, two courses are copen to the centre. These outer points will make demands for self-free vernment. The centre may try cosrcion. If the refishing point over-power the cocrave attength, its seedes, as did the States.
