GERTRUDE MANNERING A TALE OF SACRIFICE

BY FRANCES NOBLE CHAPTER XXVI.

On a bright August afternoon, two days after Lady Hunter had written her letter, the sun was reaming into an apartment in the Hotel—in Paris, where a young man sat alone, heeding not and scarcely hearing the gay, busy sounds which were incessantly wafted through the open window, as the closed blind the open window, as the closed blind was gently stirred by the summer breeze. His head was bowed down upon his arms as he leaned on the table before him, and an open letter lay there near him.

"My God!" he said at last, almost aloud, as the table on which his head rested shook under his strong agony, 'was this needed to make me yield? without this should I have gone on still resisting, still fighting against Thy grace granted to her prayer? Grace and prayer empty words to me so long; but seen now to be true as any physical science—nay, truer; perhaps alone true! Why until now have I resisted these strange impulses which at all times and in all places have seemed to move me, in the little village chapel as in stately prayers ? duomo, in busy cities as in the wild solitudes of the mountains, calling on me sometimes, as with Thy very voice, my God, bidding me believe and worship—telling me, in my pride, that the kneeling contadina, whom I have pitied and despised so often for her simple faith, was yet nearer to truth than I? Were not these all Thy grace calling on me, the grace given in answer to her prayers — her whose heart I have broken? Why only now I am able to say, 'I will arise and go to my Father, and say to Him, Father, I have sinned against heaven and before Thee, and am no longer worthy to be called Thy son'? Must the blow that lays me prostrate at last before Thee be the one that robs me of the one creature dearer to me than life, spite of the stern-ness and pride which have made me her murderer? My God! must she die, gaining for me by her very death what her sweet living example was unable to accomplish? Proud,

Then with one last, powerful effort the evil spirit strove still for the mastery—the demon of pride, which would not be driven out without a further and a terrible 'It is impossible!" whispered the tempter; "how can you do it— you, Stanley Graham, how can you bow your intellect to the dictates of a religion you have so long despised? How can you bear the jeers of a world which until now has courted and flattered you, to be treated by you in turn often with lofty disdain? How can you, who are so haughty, so impatient of contradiction, how can you kneel at the feet of a man like yourself, to own your sins and receive admonition and advice in the confessional you have so abhorred and scoffed at? How can you ever bring yourself to obey and submit to others seir to obey and submit to others—you who have so loved to rule always, who wished to tyrannize even over her who was loved as you have never loved another creature; you who would have had her think only as you directed, and because she could not yield, broke her tender heart! And for what would you do it? what would it gain for unworthy. you do it? what would it gain for you? Would it give her back to you? would it restore her fading life and win her again for yourself? life and win her again for yourself? would it make her your wife? Is she not dying? could you not seek her equally well, and implore her forgiveness, without embracing her religion? If you knelt by her death-bed to pray for forgiveness and permission to stay by her to the last, would she refuse her pardon because you had not yet become of the same faith as herself? Would even her father, bitter as he may feel against you, refuse to receive you, if you could bring a minute's greater peace and bring a minute's greater peace and joy to his dying child? How, with-slander, through long future years, from those who now court your very name, many of them not only your inferiors in intellect, but in everything?"

But with a terrible effort Stanley strove to drive away the tempter, as he rose from his bowed position and paced the room, at intervals throwing back his dark, disordered locks with a quick gesture.

'It is God or—hell; I must choose between them!' and he paused a minute in his agitated walk; "there minute in his agitated walk; "there is no medium. Against my will or not, due perhaps to her prayers, the full light has come to me today; and if I reject it, it will be with my eyes open—blind no longer, as I have let myself be so long! The struggle I once occasioned to that tender heart has come to me now in turn; but while with her it was earthly love that strove to tempt her from God, with me it is pride—deadly pride! What she was strong enough to do and die for shall I weakly turn from, when God is calling me so strangely, showing me by one clear vision, and the force of her example, what years of instruction and persuasion might have failed to do? If I resist today, may not God abandon me proud sinner who have carried me, proud sinner, who have earned this grace, not of my own merit, but by his pure mercy and her sweet

Then, as if to another Xavier, the words seemed to whisper, as the pale image of death seemed to rise before him—Death, which must come so surely to him in his pride as to the meanest creature:

'What will it profit a man if he gain the whole world and suffer the oss of his own soul ?"

And kneeling down by the table, he buried his face again upon it.
"O my God! how have I deserved Thy grace—I, who would have lost, not my own soul merely, but would have tempted Thy young, tender creature to her eternal ruin with

Then he knelt, his soul too, as it were, lay prostrate before his God, accepting the life, devoid of human joy, which must be its portion on earth-earth from which she was going who would have made it all bright, she whom his pride had slowly murdered! And ambition too must go now, at least such ambition as he had often dreamed of-that of winning, after his restblind sinner that I have been, resistless, useless life, a great name in ing all these months, trying not to hear the voice which has been callhis country's service as statesman and author, the powers of both being felt within himself, and the wealth at his command which makes such ambition easier to fulfil cold words that have done their work on the tender heart I trampled and satisfy. This too must be sacrificed—this hope, which might on in my jealous hatred of the religion she could not forswear for have made his loveless existence my sake—the religion that I must love and yield to from this hour, less dreary in the future : for as a member of God's One Church must whether she lives or dies? Warren continued to call frequently to escort Genevieve to a ball, the opera, or dinner. Indeed, he did seem to be a perfect gentleman, was extremely courteous to therein, and to which he now directed his steps, as the first perioning of his reparation, to offer up to God at this shrine of His shrine of Mother the victory just granted him over himself and the devil, and to pray for strength to persevere even amid the pain and bereavement which were rending his heart. He entered the church, and taking minutes, feeling at first only an overwhelming sense of the difference between this evening and the last time on which he had entered this holy place, when he had come to scoff politely with an acquaintance at the preyers which were being offered up, to tell himself in his bitterness that Gertrude Man-nering could not love him if she preferred all this to the pure intellectual religion he would have taught her as his wife. And now, yielding to the grace which had so yielding to the grace which had so long been whispering to his heart, he knelt here with the rest, with a faith as lively and perhaps more humble, acknowledging himself a sinner, rebelling not against the Hand which was robbing him of the sweet treasure of which he had been unworthy.

It is no use of us to be afraid of anything except error and coward-

Read your religious paper for the good you may find in it, for the help it may give you, for the strength it may impart, for the faith it may inspire, the hope it may breathe, the charity it may spread, and for the benefit of your growing and susceptible children.

It is a great truth, wonderful as it is undeniable, that all our happiness—temporal, spiritual and eternal—consists in one thing; namely, in resigning ourselves to God, and in leaving ourselves with Him to do with us and in us just as Hopless out her sweet presence, will you bear scorn and contempt, and even —Madame Guyon.

"RECOMPENSED"

Miss Rita Harrick mounted the stairs slowly, crossed the carpeted hall, and entered her room. She hall, and entered her room. She closed the door softly, then drew a comfortable chair to the wide west window. After drawing the curtains back, she sat down wearily. Instinctively her eyes sought the beautiful picture of her mother on the opposite wall. She beheld it only momentarily, however, for her vision was soon blurred by tears vision was soon blurred by tears.
Only a few hours before, her dear mother, the very center of her life, had been laid to rest, by the side of her husband, who had preceded her to the grave twenty-five years before. Rita dried her eyes and turned her gaze to the beautiful park-like lawn. Everything bespoke Mrs. Harrick was heartbroken; Rita was her only material comfort: park-like lawn. Everything bespoke mirth and gladness on this lovely April afternoon. Happy little birds chirped and fluttered from tree to tree; early spring flowers, in their gay-colored dresses, delightfully nodded their pretty heads to each other, as the gentle April breeze swept over them.

But Rita's mood did.

But Rita's mood did not blend lawn before her. Then came memories of their happy girlhood days, spent at the Convent Our Lady of the Snow, which Rita saw nestled among the trees in the distance. It was there that both had received their education. How well Rita remembered their graduation days; as she thought of them now a faint smile spread over her sweet face. It faded almost instantly, and in its stead a shadow of anxiety and worry settled on her gentle features, when she thought of the eventful vacation that followed Genevieve's when she thought of the eventful vacation that followed Genevieve's months, when one lovely evening, just as the priest finished the last instant the city.

"You may as well know the truth now as later," he said, "the case is hopeless. You may live a few weeks, a few months, or possibly a few years; I can't say exactly. But you'll never be strong again. All I can do spive you something that will ease the pain and possibly prolong your life."

The doctor's words were true—

Mrs. Harrick lingered only two months, when one lovely evening, just as the priest finished the last vacation that followed Genevieve's months, when one lovely evening graduation. She had gone with a just as the priest finished the last classmate to spend the summer at the seashore. Alas! how fatal that summer had been to Genevieve, for it was there she met Warren Rita had lived for her mother, and now that she was done, she was Hilton. That season was an exceptionally of dances, parties, and other social broke in on her thoughts, and she events. Genevieve was so pretty sat up with a start. She wiped and had such charming ways that she was one of the principal figures. Gradually she grew indifferent in the matter of religion, and little by pleasures.

When Genevieve returned home Mrs. Harrick was sadly shocked to find her so changed. Many were the kind, motherly remonstrances Mrs. Harrick made when she saw the intimacy that was rapidly grow-

"But Genny dear, you know he's not a Catholic, and it would break religion vouchsafed to him today my heart for you to marry one who is not of our faith. There are many func Catholic boys—"
"" Come now, darlin', you know He rose at last, his face pale and

Yes, and there are many splendid young men who are not Catholics," Genevieve interrupted. "You have said that yourself, mother," she added with a triumphant air."

Warren continued to call freoffer up to God at this shrine of His manners were only a veil which concealed his mercenary character from Genevieve. She doubled her prayers and visits to the Blessed Sacrament, for she had well-founded fears of the ultimate culmination of Genevieve's familiar associations with Warren.

How soon these fears were realized! When Warren announced that urgent business affairs neces-sitated his immediate leave from the city, and offered Genevieve a share in his heart, home, and fortune, she readily and eagerly accepted, in spite of her mother's and sister's tearful entreaties.

"Rita, you're worse than mother," was Genevieve's reply when Rita fairly begged her to reconsider her step. "What is it to you and mother if I want to marry the man I love? You certainly shouldn't begrudge me 'this' happiness."

"Are you sure you'll be happy."
"The dear old soul! Wonder what I could do without her," Rita murmered to herself as the door closed. She really felt very tired, so decided to go to bed. She knelt to recite the rosary for "mother and Genny." Are you sure you'll be happy, my?" Rita inquired.

Genny?" Rita inquired.
"Why shouldn't I be? I'll have a lovely home and friends of the hightest social standing."
"I don't see how you can stifle a lovely home and friends of the hightest social standing."

"I don't see how you can stifle the voice of conscience so easily, Genevieve, after all the years of solid instruction at Our Lady of the Snow. You certainly must know that it is very sinful to attempt marriage out of the Church." For Warren had positively refused to the would eat if she had something.

"Oh, bosh, Rita," she said with annoyance in her tone, "I'm tired of Lady of the Snow with all its precepts—simply tired of it," she added with emphasis. "Just because you're such a little goody-goodstay-at-home-mamma-girl, that's no reason why I should be."

Rita was shocked into silence. She gave Genevieve a reproachful look and left the room to comfort her mother, whose heart was wrung with grief by the headstrong determination of her daughter to follow such a fatal course.

Genevieve was heedless of every endearing comment and gentle per-suasion her mother could offer, and in a fit of anger left the house, feeling her first duty was towards 10 Metcalfe Street

Eight years had passed when Mrs But Rita's mood did not blend with the gay atmosphere about her. Genevieve flushed slightly at the mention of conscience. It seemed to her as if Rita was reading her soul, for she was having a little trouble just then to hush the little voice that kept saying: "It is wrong, very wrong."

She soon succeeded, however, with the thought: "We'll see about doing better later;" a thing she had practiced so, long that it could now be done with remarkable ease.
