

S. S. Lines

Montreal... August 4
San Francisco... August 11
Vancouver... August 18
Seattle... August 25
Portland... August 31
Astoria... August 31
Champlain... August 10
New York... August 10
Majestic... August 1
Oceanic... August 8
Panama... August 11
New York... August 11
Easternland... August 8
Messia... July 28
Soria... August 11
Kaiser Wilhelm... August 11
Ailer... August 11
State of Nebraska... August 4
Boston... August 4
Miss... August 11

LWAUKEE

for the Chicago, Milwaukee Railway, known as the "Great Railway of the West"
between St. Paul,
Omaha and Chicago.
Connections are made with the best service known.
Electric lights, steam heating, etc. equalled by no other line.

C. J. EDDY, General Agent

Portland, Or.

Way & Navigation Company

limited

INTERNATIONAL

Nelson at 6:00 a. m.,
Returning, leaves
m., calling at Balfour, and all way points.

IRVING, Manager, Kaslo, B. C.

W. & N.

THE EAST VIA SALT AND DENVER.

RAILS DAILY

QUICKEST ROUTE
Des Moines, Lewiston,
City Mines, Portland,
Apple Creek Gold Mines and South. Only line to Europe and other

TIME SCHEDULE

Table with columns: Time Schedule, Arrives, Daily. Lists routes to Farmington, Gar-fax, Pullman, etc.

SEA LINES

Portland
FROM ASTORIA
8:00 p. m., and from Spent
Astoria, at 11:00 a. m., every

WATER LINES

Portland
FROM ASTORIA
8:00 p. m., and from Spent
Astoria, at 11:00 a. m., every

WATER LINES

Portland
FROM ASTORIA
8:00 p. m., and from Spent
Astoria, at 11:00 a. m., every

WATER LINES

Portland
FROM ASTORIA
8:00 p. m., and from Spent
Astoria, at 11:00 a. m., every

THE MINING REVIEW

The Ledge on the Giant Mine has Been Relocated.

AN IMPORTANT SMELTER DEAL

The Plant at Trail to Change Hands—Figures Showing Capacity of Le Roi Mines and Plant—A Shipment From I. X. L.—Road to Velvet.

According to the data published in the Miner which was lately endorsed by the official publication of the Rossland board of trade, the output of the Le Roi mines, including the Josie and Nickel Plate group but neglecting the Columbia-Kootenay, on or about the first of October next, should be 1,550 tons per diem; that is to say, with the completion of this hoisting plant over the five compartment shaft and the installation of the new 40-horse power compressor.

Mr. Purcell then determined to follow the ore which was in the shaft from the surface and which ran out of it to the width of a depth of 75 feet. Here a round of holes was put into the south side of the shaft and the blasting disclosed a fine body of ore. This was crosscut and sunk on for a short distance, and the work of drifting both east and west upon it is now in progress. There has been about four and a half feet crosscut, and it is in ore all the way.

A round of holes was made on the hanging walls yesterday to a depth of five feet, and was in ore all the way. This would indicate that the lead at this point is at least nine and a half feet in width and further crosscutting will probably disclose that it is much wider. The ore is chalcopyrite and pyrrhotite, and there is considerable calcite mixed with it. The copper values seem to predominate. No assays have been made as yet, and the value of the ore is not known. The ledge will be drifted in both an easterly and westerly direction. Further on a winze was run down on the ore. It is thought when the ledge is found at depth that it will dip to the north, and this is a question which the future will determine.

Mr. Purcell then determined to follow the ore which was in the shaft from the surface and which ran out of it to the width of a depth of 75 feet. Here a round of holes was put into the south side of the shaft and the blasting disclosed a fine body of ore. This was crosscut and sunk on for a short distance, and the work of drifting both east and west upon it is now in progress.

Mr. Purcell then determined to follow the ore which was in the shaft from the surface and which ran out of it to the width of a depth of 75 feet. Here a round of holes was put into the south side of the shaft and the blasting disclosed a fine body of ore. This was crosscut and sunk on for a short distance, and the work of drifting both east and west upon it is now in progress.

Mr. Purcell then determined to follow the ore which was in the shaft from the surface and which ran out of it to the width of a depth of 75 feet. Here a round of holes was put into the south side of the shaft and the blasting disclosed a fine body of ore. This was crosscut and sunk on for a short distance, and the work of drifting both east and west upon it is now in progress.

Mr. Purcell then determined to follow the ore which was in the shaft from the surface and which ran out of it to the width of a depth of 75 feet. Here a round of holes was put into the south side of the shaft and the blasting disclosed a fine body of ore. This was crosscut and sunk on for a short distance, and the work of drifting both east and west upon it is now in progress.

Mr. Purcell then determined to follow the ore which was in the shaft from the surface and which ran out of it to the width of a depth of 75 feet. Here a round of holes was put into the south side of the shaft and the blasting disclosed a fine body of ore. This was crosscut and sunk on for a short distance, and the work of drifting both east and west upon it is now in progress.

Mr. Purcell then determined to follow the ore which was in the shaft from the surface and which ran out of it to the width of a depth of 75 feet. Here a round of holes was put into the south side of the shaft and the blasting disclosed a fine body of ore. This was crosscut and sunk on for a short distance, and the work of drifting both east and west upon it is now in progress.

Mr. Purcell then determined to follow the ore which was in the shaft from the surface and which ran out of it to the width of a depth of 75 feet. Here a round of holes was put into the south side of the shaft and the blasting disclosed a fine body of ore. This was crosscut and sunk on for a short distance, and the work of drifting both east and west upon it is now in progress.

Mr. Purcell then determined to follow the ore which was in the shaft from the surface and which ran out of it to the width of a depth of 75 feet. Here a round of holes was put into the south side of the shaft and the blasting disclosed a fine body of ore. This was crosscut and sunk on for a short distance, and the work of drifting both east and west upon it is now in progress.

Mr. Purcell then determined to follow the ore which was in the shaft from the surface and which ran out of it to the width of a depth of 75 feet. Here a round of holes was put into the south side of the shaft and the blasting disclosed a fine body of ore. This was crosscut and sunk on for a short distance, and the work of drifting both east and west upon it is now in progress.

THE MAHLIN MURDER

A Pinkerton Detective Obtains a Confession.

ERNEST CHENOWETH ACCUSED

The Statement by the Child—The Evidence Strongly Contradicted by the Relations—The Boy is Locked up—His Mother's Story.

The affair of the murder of Mah Lin was not allowed to rest. Communication was maintained by the local Chinese with their countrymen in Victoria. The latter, acting on the advice of Chief Ingram, secured the services of Mr. P. Ahern, assistant superintendent of the Pinkerton agency at Seattle. He came here on Saturday last and had a long consultation with Chief Ingram. The latter detailed Officer Kaymer, who had charge of the case from the start, to work up in conjunction with Mr. Ahern. As a result the two men went to Mrs. Chenoweth on Sunday last and wanted to see her son Ernest. The mother allowed the child to go away with her visitors. As a result the whole of the story of the murder was obtained from the youngster. He related in a matter of fact way that there had been a few words between him and the Chinaman, and that the deceased Mah Lin had laughed at him, whereupon the precocious child avowed that he would show his mother was wrong, for you see he did not fall backwards. The gun was then picked up by the cool perpetrator of the deed and replaced where he found it. The boy said he knew too much to let the gun remain where it was. He then slunk out of the back door and went off to see the house being moved below the railway depot just as he related to the coroner at the inquest.

After this statement had been dragged out of the boy piece meal he was taken down before Coroner Bowes and made a full statement before witnesses. The boy is now in custody, and will be brought before Police Magistrate Boulton this morning at 10 o'clock.

The murder of Mah Lin took place on the 23d of last May, and has since that time been enveloped in much mystery. Though the theory that the child Ernest committed the murder was broached at the time there was the utter absence of motive which still exists, and the youth of the culprit which went against the theory of his having been the murderer being anywhere generally accepted. In fact, the general suspicion was that the Chinese highlanders knew more of the matter than any one else. This imputation was bitterly resented by the Chinese community, and to this view must be placed the reason of their unflinching efforts to bring home the murder to the real perpetrator.

The boy Ernest is a bright, intelligent youngster of his age, but would seem from the unwavering way in which he stood by his story as told on the 28th of May to the coroner and to the cross-examining lawyers, to be a most accomplished little liar. It was thought possible by the coroner himself at the time that the story so straightly told by a child that declared he did not know the nature of an oath could be otherwise than true. What the trouble was between him and the Chinaman has not come out. The boy said he was playing with a pan, two cups and some broken dishes and made believe that he was keeping the house. The deceased laughed at him and he then threatened to kill him, and actually, young as he was, carried out his threat. Whether this was the real circumstance that led up to the shooting will probably never be known, as there were no witnesses, and the word of the killer can never be taken beyond the main facts of the case, as he has proved himself such an unblinking little liar.

Also the statement that he snatched the gun while taking it across the bed cannot be verified nor even believed for the same reasons. There is this much to be said in support of the accidental nature of the discharge that the deceased, who, from the nature of the wound inflicted must have seen the action of Ernest Chenoweth, from the position of the body, could hardly have thought the boy in earnest, as he made no effort to stop him firing. A couple of strides would, in that small house, have placed him alongside the child. Whether this be the truth or not, the case is now all the worse for young Ernest that the confession was in a measure forced, and that it came at so late a date. The boy was no doubt frightened at his awful deed, but his after behavior shows him to be a master in iniquity despite his tender years.

It may be stated incidentally that the theory of Chief Ingram from the first was that the boy was the one who did the killing of Mah Lin. The chief was satisfied that the shot was fired from the rifle, and a number of minor circumstances pointed to the boy as the culprit. One of the strongest points against the lad was the testimony of Mrs. E. Wright. On the afternoon of the killing Mrs. Wright wished to go down town and left Ernest to take care of the chickens, and promised him a reward if he would do so. The fact that he left before Mrs. Wright returned told her that he got an outside detective for the reason that the local officers were all known to the parties in the neighborhood, and that a stranger could work to better advantage. This idea was followed out, and the result as outlined above was arrived at.

So far the theory and the evidence of the police, and it will be noticed that the whole of the foregoing facts and inferences depend for their accuracy on the evidence extorted from a child of eight years of age. One story is good until another is told, and the preceding story is good in this only. A clever lawyer has been engaged for the defence, and it will doubtless be made apparent that this story does not hang together quite so well as it should if a conviction is to be obtained.

The mother of young Ernest declares that the police came to her house on Sunday afternoon at 1 o'clock and said that they desired to see the lad in order to ask of him a few questions, and Mrs. Chenoweth declared that she had no objection especially as they promised "on their honor" to bring back the boy within half an hour. Up to last evening the mother was not allowed to see her boy at all, although Mrs. Chenoweth, on hearing of the boy's arrest, went down to the police and asked where her son was. The police, she says, declared that they did not know. As Merton Stevens, the eldest son of Mrs. Chenoweth, who is a miner at the Columbia Kootenay mine, put the case: My brother did not get a square deal. Any prisoner is able to see his friend, and there seems no justice of keeping a prisoner at the death of their Chinaman boy's mother. "It may be the law, but it did not seem right," he went on to say.

As far as the law is concerned, according to a leading barrister of this city, there seems to be none that would justify the action of the police, although it is the usual practice in French courts. Mrs. Chenoweth denied emphatically the guilt of young Ernest. On being confronted with the confession, she declared that it did not seem like the words of her son at all, but rather a story made up about him. She was confident that the so-called confession was bogus.

Merton Stevens was equally positive. He said that if there had been anything whatsoever in the story of the guilt of Ernest that surely a little chatterbox as he was would have divulged the matter. He had heard his half-brother teased about the death of their Chinaman boy several occasions, but he had never heard a word let fall by him even when provoked into a passion by his tormentors that would lead anybody to think that the murder was committed by him. Merton Stevens said: "I do not believe a word of the so-called confession, and to the man that, knowing my brother, would say that he did, I would say that he was a liar."

Mr. Stevens was of the same opinion, and expressed himself equally indignantly. He said that Ernest might have said the words that were imputed to him, but if he did he was only repeating them like a parrot. The lad was taken away from his friends, and was shut up with strange men, who likely told him that the story he told at the inquest was a lie, and suggested other things to him and made him believe it. "Why," said Mrs. Chenoweth, "if I were to tell him that he had been at the Paris exposition and was to tell him a few times what he had done there the little chatterbox is that simple that he would actually believe the story and would repeat it as his own." She declared that the boy was not really clever, but his never ending talk sometimes made him appear so to onlookers.

Mr. D. Gaskley, a neighbor, said that he saw Mrs. Chenoweth and her son arrive at the scene of the murder on the night of the death of Mah Lin. He stated that the child behaved in a perfectly natural way, and the idea of his guilt had never crossed his mind. He knew the boy well, too, as he had lived next door to him for quite a little while, and thought him a good boy as boys went. He had never seen him with a gun, and had nothing whatsoever against him, thinking no worse of him at any time, including the present, than that he was a little chatterbox.

THE MAHLIN MURDER

A Pinkerton Detective Obtains a Confession.

ERNEST CHENOWETH ACCUSED

The Statement by the Child—The Evidence Strongly Contradicted by the Relations—The Boy is Locked up—His Mother's Story.

The affair of the murder of Mah Lin was not allowed to rest. Communication was maintained by the local Chinese with their countrymen in Victoria. The latter, acting on the advice of Chief Ingram, secured the services of Mr. P. Ahern, assistant superintendent of the Pinkerton agency at Seattle. He came here on Saturday last and had a long consultation with Chief Ingram. The latter detailed Officer Kaymer, who had charge of the case from the start, to work up in conjunction with Mr. Ahern. As a result the two men went to Mrs. Chenoweth on Sunday last and wanted to see her son Ernest. The mother allowed the child to go away with her visitors. As a result the whole of the story of the murder was obtained from the youngster. He related in a matter of fact way that there had been a few words between him and the Chinaman, and that the deceased Mah Lin had laughed at him, whereupon the precocious child avowed that he would show his mother was wrong, for you see he did not fall backwards. The gun was then picked up by the cool perpetrator of the deed and replaced where he found it. The boy said he knew too much to let the gun remain where it was. He then slunk out of the back door and went off to see the house being moved below the railway depot just as he related to the coroner at the inquest.

After this statement had been dragged out of the boy piece meal he was taken down before Coroner Bowes and made a full statement before witnesses. The boy is now in custody, and will be brought before Police Magistrate Boulton this morning at 10 o'clock.

The murder of Mah Lin took place on the 23d of last May, and has since that time been enveloped in much mystery. Though the theory that the child Ernest committed the murder was broached at the time there was the utter absence of motive which still exists, and the youth of the culprit which went against the theory of his having been the murderer being anywhere generally accepted. In fact, the general suspicion was that the Chinese highlanders knew more of the matter than any one else. This imputation was bitterly resented by the Chinese community, and to this view must be placed the reason of their unflinching efforts to bring home the murder to the real perpetrator.

The boy Ernest is a bright, intelligent youngster of his age, but would seem from the unwavering way in which he stood by his story as told on the 28th of May to the coroner and to the cross-examining lawyers, to be a most accomplished little liar. It was thought possible by the coroner himself at the time that the story so straightly told by a child that declared he did not know the nature of an oath could be otherwise than true. What the trouble was between him and the Chinaman has not come out. The boy said he was playing with a pan, two cups and some broken dishes and made believe that he was keeping the house. The deceased laughed at him and he then threatened to kill him, and actually, young as he was, carried out his threat. Whether this was the real circumstance that led up to the shooting will probably never be known, as there were no witnesses, and the word of the killer can never be taken beyond the main facts of the case, as he has proved himself such an unblinking little liar.

Also the statement that he snatched the gun while taking it across the bed cannot be verified nor even believed for the same reasons. There is this much to be said in support of the accidental nature of the discharge that the deceased, who, from the nature of the wound inflicted must have seen the action of Ernest Chenoweth, from the position of the body, could hardly have thought the boy in earnest, as he made no effort to stop him firing. A couple of strides would, in that small house, have placed him alongside the child. Whether this be the truth or not, the case is now all the worse for young Ernest that the confession was in a measure forced, and that it came at so late a date. The boy was no doubt frightened at his awful deed, but his after behavior shows him to be a master in iniquity despite his tender years.

It may be stated incidentally that the theory of Chief Ingram from the first was that the boy was the one who did the killing of Mah Lin. The chief was satisfied that the shot was fired from the rifle, and a number of minor circumstances pointed to the boy as the culprit. One of the strongest points against the lad was the testimony of Mrs. E. Wright. On the afternoon of the killing Mrs. Wright wished to go down town and left Ernest to take care of the chickens, and promised him a reward if he would do so. The fact that he left before Mrs. Wright returned told her that he got an outside detective for the reason that the local officers were all known to the parties in the neighborhood, and that a stranger could work to better advantage. This idea was followed out, and the result as outlined above was arrived at.

So far the theory and the evidence of the police, and it will be noticed that the whole of the foregoing facts and inferences depend for their accuracy on the evidence extorted from a child of eight years of age. One story is good until another is told, and the preceding story is good in this only. A clever lawyer has been engaged for the defence, and it will doubtless be made apparent that this story does not hang together quite so well as it should if a conviction is to be obtained.

The mother of young Ernest declares that the police came to her house on Sunday afternoon at 1 o'clock and said that they desired to see the lad in order to ask of him a few questions, and Mrs. Chenoweth declared that she had no objection especially as they promised "on their honor" to bring back the boy within half an hour. Up to last evening the mother was not allowed to see her boy at all, although Mrs. Chenoweth, on hearing of the boy's arrest, went down to the police and asked where her son was. The police, she says, declared that they did not know. As Merton Stevens, the eldest son of Mrs. Chenoweth, who is a miner at the Columbia Kootenay mine, put the case: My brother did not get a square deal. Any prisoner is able to see his friend, and there seems no justice of keeping a prisoner at the death of their Chinaman boy's mother. "It may be the law, but it did not seem right," he went on to say.

As far as the law is concerned, according to a leading barrister of this city, there seems to be none that would justify the action of the police, although it is the usual practice in French courts. Mrs. Chenoweth denied emphatically the guilt of young Ernest. On being confronted with the confession, she declared that it did not seem like the words of her son at all, but rather a story made up about him. She was confident that the so-called confession was bogus.

Merton Stevens was equally positive. He said that if there had been anything whatsoever in the story of the guilt of Ernest that surely a little chatterbox as he was would have divulged the matter. He had heard his half-brother teased about the death of their Chinaman boy several occasions, but he had never heard a word let fall by him even when provoked into a passion by his tormentors that would lead anybody to think that the murder was committed by him. Merton Stevens said: "I do not believe a word of the so-called confession, and to the man that, knowing my brother, would say that he did, I would say that he was a liar."

Mr. Stevens was of the same opinion, and expressed himself equally indignantly. He said that Ernest might have said the words that were imputed to him, but if he did he was only repeating them like a parrot. The lad was taken away from his friends, and was shut up with strange men, who likely told him that the story he told at the inquest was a lie, and suggested other things to him and made him believe it. "Why," said Mrs. Chenoweth, "if I were to tell him that he had been at the Paris exposition and was to tell him a few times what he had done there the little chatterbox is that simple that he would actually believe the story and would repeat it as his own." She declared that the boy was not really clever, but his never ending talk sometimes made him appear so to onlookers.

Mr. D. Gaskley, a neighbor, said that he saw Mrs. Chenoweth and her son arrive at the scene of the murder on the night of the death of Mah Lin. He stated that the child behaved in a perfectly natural way, and the idea of his guilt had never crossed his mind. He knew the boy well, too, as he had lived next door to him for quite a little while, and thought him a good boy as boys went. He had never seen him with a gun, and had nothing whatsoever against him, thinking no worse of him at any time, including the present, than that he was a little chatterbox.

THE MAHLIN MURDER

A Pinkerton Detective Obtains a Confession.

ERNEST CHENOWETH ACCUSED

The Statement by the Child—The Evidence Strongly Contradicted by the Relations—The Boy is Locked up—His Mother's Story.

The affair of the murder of Mah Lin was not allowed to rest. Communication was maintained by the local Chinese with their countrymen in Victoria. The latter, acting on the advice of Chief Ingram, secured the services of Mr. P. Ahern, assistant superintendent of the Pinkerton agency at Seattle. He came here on Saturday last and had a long consultation with Chief Ingram. The latter detailed Officer Kaymer, who had charge of the case from the start, to work up in conjunction with Mr. Ahern. As a result the two men went to Mrs. Chenoweth on Sunday last and wanted to see her son Ernest. The mother allowed the child to go away with her visitors. As a result the whole of the story of the murder was obtained from the youngster. He related in a matter of fact way that there had been a few words between him and the Chinaman, and that the deceased Mah Lin had laughed at him, whereupon the precocious child avowed that he would show his mother was wrong, for you see he did not fall backwards. The gun was then picked up by the cool perpetrator of the deed and replaced where he found it. The boy said he knew too much to let the gun remain where it was. He then slunk out of the back door and went off to see the house being moved below the railway depot just as he related to the coroner at the inquest.

After this statement had been dragged out of the boy piece meal he was taken down before Coroner Bowes and made a full statement before witnesses. The boy is now in custody, and will be brought before Police Magistrate Boulton this morning at 10 o'clock.

The murder of Mah Lin took place on the 23d of last May, and has since that time been enveloped in much mystery. Though the theory that the child Ernest committed the murder was broached at the time there was the utter absence of motive which still exists, and the youth of the culprit which went against the theory of his having been the murderer being anywhere generally accepted. In fact, the general suspicion was that the Chinese highlanders knew more of the matter than any one else. This imputation was bitterly resented by the Chinese community, and to this view must be placed the reason of their unflinching efforts to bring home the murder to the real perpetrator.

The boy Ernest is a bright, intelligent youngster of his age, but would seem from the unwavering way in which he stood by his story as told on the 28th of May to the coroner and to the cross-examining lawyers, to be a most accomplished little liar. It was thought possible by the coroner himself at the time that the story so straightly told by a child that declared he did not know the nature of an oath could be otherwise than true. What the trouble was between him and the Chinaman has not come out. The boy said he was playing with a pan, two cups and some broken dishes and made believe that he was keeping the house. The deceased laughed at him and he then threatened to kill him, and actually, young as he was, carried out his threat. Whether this was the real circumstance that led up to the shooting will probably never be known, as there were no witnesses, and the word of the killer can never be taken beyond the main facts of the case, as he has proved himself such an unblinking little liar.

Also the statement that he snatched the gun while taking it across the bed cannot be verified nor even believed for the same reasons. There is this much to be said in support of the accidental nature of the discharge that the deceased, who, from the nature of the wound inflicted must have seen the action of Ernest Chenoweth, from the position of the body, could hardly have thought the boy in earnest, as he made no effort to stop him firing. A couple of strides would, in that small house, have placed him alongside the child. Whether this be the truth or not, the case is now all the worse for young Ernest that the confession was in a measure forced, and that it came at so late a date. The boy was no doubt frightened at his awful deed, but his after behavior shows him to be a master in iniquity despite his tender years.

It may be stated incidentally that the theory of Chief Ingram from the first was that the boy was the one who did the killing of Mah Lin. The chief was satisfied that the shot was fired from the rifle, and a number of minor circumstances pointed to the boy as the culprit. One of the strongest points against the lad was the testimony of Mrs. E. Wright. On the afternoon of the killing Mrs. Wright wished to go down town and left Ernest to take care of the chickens, and promised him a reward if he would do so. The fact that he left before Mrs. Wright returned told her that he got an outside detective for the reason that the local officers were all known to the parties in the neighborhood, and that a stranger could work to better advantage. This idea was followed out, and the result as outlined above was arrived at.

So far the theory and the evidence of the police, and it will be noticed that the whole of the foregoing facts and inferences depend for their accuracy on the evidence extorted from a child of eight years of age. One story is good until another is told, and the preceding story is good in this only. A clever lawyer has been engaged for the defence, and it will doubtless be made apparent that this story does not hang together quite so well as it should if a conviction is to be obtained.

The mother of young Ernest declares that the police came to her house on Sunday afternoon at 1 o'clock and said that they desired to see the lad in order to ask of him a few questions, and Mrs. Chenoweth declared that she had no objection especially as they promised "on their honor" to bring back the boy within half an hour. Up to last evening the mother was not allowed to see her boy at all, although Mrs. Chenoweth, on hearing of the boy's arrest, went down to the police and asked where her son was. The police, she says, declared that they did not know. As Merton Stevens, the eldest son of Mrs. Chenoweth, who is a miner at the Columbia Kootenay mine, put the case: My brother did not get a square deal. Any prisoner is able to see his friend, and there seems no justice of keeping a prisoner at the death of their Chinaman boy's mother. "It may be the law, but it did not seem right," he went on to say.

As far as the law is concerned, according to a leading barrister of this city, there seems to be none that would justify the action of the police, although it is the usual practice in French courts. Mrs. Chenoweth denied emphatically the guilt of young Ernest. On being confronted with the confession, she declared that it did not seem like the words of her son at all, but rather a story made up about him. She was confident that the so-called confession was bogus.

Merton Stevens was equally positive. He said that if there had been anything whatsoever in the story of the guilt of Ernest that surely a little chatterbox as he was would have divulged the matter. He had heard his half-brother teased about the death of their Chinaman boy several occasions, but he had never heard a word let fall by him even when provoked into a passion by his tormentors that would lead anybody to think that the murder was committed by him. Merton Stevens said: "I do not believe a word of the so-called confession, and to the man that, knowing my brother, would say that he did, I would say that he was a liar."

Mr. Stevens was of the same opinion, and expressed himself equally indignantly. He said that Ernest might have said the words that were imputed to him, but if he did he was only repeating them like a parrot. The lad was taken away from his friends, and was shut up with strange men, who likely told him that the story he told at the inquest was a lie, and suggested other things to him and made him believe it. "Why," said Mrs. Chenoweth, "if I were to tell him that he had been at the Paris exposition and was to tell him a few times what he had done there the little chatterbox is that simple that he would actually believe the story and would repeat it as his own." She declared that the boy was not really clever, but his never ending talk sometimes made him appear so to onlookers.

Mr. D. Gaskley, a neighbor, said that he saw Mrs. Chenoweth and her son arrive at the scene of the murder on the night of the death of Mah Lin. He stated that the child behaved in a perfectly natural way, and the idea of his guilt had never crossed his mind. He knew the boy well, too, as he had lived next door to him for quite a little while, and thought him a good boy as boys went. He had never seen him with a gun, and had nothing whatsoever against him, thinking no worse of him at any time, including the present, than that he was a little chatterbox.

THE ROSSLAND MINER'S

MAP

...OF THE...

Rossland Camp

The mines and mining claims of the Rossland and their buildings, such as shaft houses, compressor plants, ore houses, boarding houses, etc., are all on the map.

All physical features of the surrounding country, such as mountains, hills, valleys, plateaux are shown just as they are. The winding of railways, wagon roads and trails are correctly represented.

Accurate

The map is almost a photographic picture of the Rossland camp, with the exception that it is produced in colors and shows the country as it is in the early summer.

No expense has been spared to make this map a really first-class production of artists, engineers and engravers. Two skilled, active and experienced men were constantly employed on the work for three months.

The Rossland Miner's Map

It is the most complete and elaborate map of Rossland and the surrounding country that has been published.

It is finely lithographed in several colors on the finest and most durable paper.

Complete

Renew your subscription to the ROSSLAND WEEKLY MINER by paying $2.10—the 10 cents to cover cost of mailing—and receive a copy of this beautiful map.

Send orders to...

The Rossland Miner Printing and Publishing Co., Limited, Rossland, B. C.

man, Antonio Ranetta, had come up to him and had struck him on the face. He then left the bar and went down Spokane street and saw his assistant, Ranetta, at the bar of the Miners' Arms. Ranetta came out, and the witness asked him why he had struck him previously, but the reply he received was a kick on the knee, whereat he ran away. Ranetta followed, and catching him, threw him down. Accused struggled, and, striking at Ranetta with his penknife, which he had taken down against him. In this case, however, it seemed as if the boy had been separated from his friends and first made to confess so that his own words should be used against him. Of course, they declared, they supposed that a large reward had been offered and somebody had to be found guilty.

THE CUNNING AFFAIR.

Final Evidence Tendered in Its Case—Decision Reserved.

On the previous hearing of the case the evidence had all been taken for the prosecution. For the defence Mr. R. W. Armstrong placed the defendant, John Berketti, on the stand, who declared that he was in the Merchant's hotel having a drink at bar at 11:20 on the night of July 16, and that the injured if it came outside he would fix him. The Caesar Methodo testified that he had known the defendant for some time, and that he had always found him to be a peaceable character.

The landlord of the Merchants' hotel said he had seen Berketti at the bar on the night in question, but that he had not noticed that he was making any disturbance.

Mr. K. W. Armstrong argued in favor of his client that he had only used the weapon in self-defence, and when afraid of receiving grievous bodily harm, and that no malice was shown. He also said that if one was guilty both were, and that the affair was, after all, a mere drunken squabble. He pleaded the previous good character of his client in mitigation of his offence should Magistrate Boulton deem him guilty.

Read the Rossland Miner.

Relief of the Rheumatic

A Joy Greater than that which Came to the Brave Little Garrison at Ladsmyth has Come to Thousands Suffering and Crippled and Discouraged Rheumatics from the use of the Great South American Rheumatic Cure.