Salisbury and the Lord Mayor's Show.

It was not Kerry, it was not Derry, it was not Ireland, it was the ever-faithful London, the English capital and seat of government, which was placed in a state of siege on Tuesday last. That day should be in the order of things, which we are told is now fast changing, have been a great day for London. It was the day of inauguration for the newly-chosen Mayor of London City, an official who is not elected by the general suffrage of his fellow-citizens, but by the aldermen, mainly through the guilds, those descended relics of the grand tradition of Catholic days when employers and those whom they employed formed one compact body in work, in recreation, in worship, producing skilled artistry in every craft. The old Catholic guilds were the best trades' unions that the world has ever known, and when occasion called for they could fight as well as pray, as the guilds of Flanders taught the monarchs and knights of France.

In those old Catholic days the Lord Mayor of London was an important functionary. Nowadays he has degenerated into little more than a figurehead with a supposed unlimited capacity for the absorption of article soup. But Lord Mayor's day and the Lord Mayor's Show, as it is called, remains a great London civic festival. A curious and rather patchwork procession passes through the streets which "all" London is supposed to turn out and see. After having taken the oath of office and been duly inaugurated, the Lord Mayor gives a banquet in the evening at the Guild Hall to the Ministers of the Crown and other grandees. The banquet occurring during the Parliamentary recess, it is generally made the occasion by the Premier of foreshadowing the Government's policy and communicating to the country his views on home and foreign affairs.

Lord Salisbury spoke at the banquet. But as the English Premier was preparing his speech that day, he must have been impressed by the picture which the streets of London presented at the inauguration of London's chief civic magistrate. It was not an admiring crowd that came out to see the show. Hungry and angry men in thousands poured out to give a show of their own. Many of them may have been men who live by agitation; many more thieves or thugs, the disorderly element of society, ever on the watch for an opportunity to wreck, rob and cheat. But the main body of the men who greeted the show with an ominous silence, or with occasional hisses and boos, were doubtless honest men who wanted work, but could find none, and whose main desire was to get work, in order to provide house, fire, food and clothing for themselves, and support for their families. This is the contrast that London always presents, the two extremes; the extreme of wealth and luxury, hemmed in, surrounded, submerged almost, by the extreme of want and misery and squalor; and the second extreme is increasing every year in what is only too truly called the modern Babylon. So it was found necessary to call out an army of police, to mass the soldiers, and to close up and barricade the houses along the route of the procession, against whom? Against London's own citizens.

And what had Lord Salisbury to say in his speech? The same old shibboleth about Ireland. The Conservative position on Irish affairs could not be misinterpreted. "Their business was to legislate in favor of the Empire, and to enforce laws which had long been neglected and trodden under foot." If Lord Salisbury's eyes were only open to realities he would see that the integrity of his Empire is much more dangerously menaced in London today, at the very foot of the throne, than in Ireland or in India. What ever calm has come to Irish of the Land League and the clergy, and the partially successful Conservative attempt to steal Gladstone's Irish throne.

It is not that Lord Salisbury is averse to a people's liberation, local self-government and freedom from foreign yoke. For instance, he would welcome Egypt of the English yoke, but unhappily, England's pledges subject her stay in Egypt to work limit, not a limit of time. That is to say, England will abandon Egypt when she gets through with her work there and her holders of Egyptian bonds, and when that happy but indefinite date arrives there may be something of a Egypt left besides sand. Lord Salisbury makes the capital joke that the English could not leave until that country was secured from foreign oppression and foreign interference, which he says elsewhere England can do with possibility permit? And here is how the speaker of Bulgaria, with the glow and the fervor of a Kościuszko: "The sympathies of the English people were aroused by the spectacle of her struggle for independence, and the language of diplomatic menace used towards Bulgaria by a European State had caused the

The Origin of the Game of Chess.

Many centuries ago there happened to be a powerful prince whose kingdom lay along the shores of the Ganges, and who took to himself the proud title of King of the Indies. He began to reign while very young, and before he had learned that a king should be the father of his people, and that the most sure and solid support of a throne is the love and loyalty of the subjects. So when the Brahmins and Rajahs (the priests and nobles) reminded him of this, he not only despised their counsels, but caused some of them to be put to death for venturing to give him advice unasked.

Left to the unsafe company of his flatterers, the king fell into every kind of excess, until his oppressed subjects resolved to free themselves. Then it was that an Indian philosopher named Sissa, the son of Dabur, undertook to open the eyes of the prince to the fatal effect of his folly. With this intention he invented the game of chess, where the king, the most important of all the pieces, is both powerless to attack his foes and to defend himself without the aid of his subjects.

The new game soon became fashionable, the king heard of it and wished to learn it. Sissa was asked to teach him, and while explaining the rules and showing him the skill required to use the other pieces in the king's defense, the Brahmin taught him many truths which he had hitherto refused to listen. Endowed with a sound mind, the king took Sissa's lessons to heart, and changed his way of life, and thus averted the evils which threatened his kingdom. Anxious to show his gratitude, he left to Sissa the choice of reward, who requested the number of grains of corn might be given him which the number of squares on the chess board should produce—one for the first, two for the second, four for the third, and so on, always doubling to the sixty-fourth. The king surprised at the modesty of the request granted it instantly; but when his treasurer had made a calculation, he found that the king had engaged to perform an impossible task, there not being grain enough in all his storehouses to fulfill his promise. From this wise Sissa taught the king the danger of hasty promises, and the necessity of exercising caution even in dealing with those in whom one has the greatest confidence.

The game of chess was not long confined to India. The Persians looked upon it as a game to be used in all his storehouses to fulfill his promise. From this wise Sissa taught the king the danger of hasty promises, and the necessity of exercising caution even in dealing with those in whom one has the greatest confidence.

For Toilet Use.

Ayer's Hair Vigor keeps the hair soft and pliant, imparts to it the beauty and freshness of youth, causes it to grow luxuriantly, eradicates Dandruff, cures all scalp diseases, and is the most cleanly of all toilet preparations.

AYER'S Hair Vigor has given me perfect satisfaction. I was twenty years of age when I first used it, and my hair was thin, and falling out in large quantities. Ayer's Hair Vigor stopped the falling, and my hair became again its original color. As a dressing for the hair, this preparation has no equal.—Mary S. Hammond, Stillwater, Mass.

HAIR that has become weak, gray, and colorless, may have new life and vigor imparted to it by the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. My hair was thin, and dry, and fell out in large quantities.
