

CHAPTER IX.

BESSIE'S CONFIDENCES.

'I do not believe he is dead. Suppose we try to find Jack Madison. I think I could feel a great interest in Jack. I got Alphonse to give me a copy of his photo of the runaway.' And she took it from a little case, and handed it to her father. 'I have seen a face that is a little like this in expression; and yet it is l not a common face.' 'It is a very uncommon face. 'It is a very uncommon face. Would it not be a good thing to find Jack and send the prodical back to his father? He would be welcomed home, I am sure. Uncle Sam wants him, but he is too stiff necked a Philistine to say so.' 'How did you like your cousin

Louisa? There is nothing to disapprove of in Louisa - perhaps she would be nicer if there was. I was always forced to admire Louisa's extreme propriety; and yet sometimes I wish-
