Afraid in the Dark.

By EUTH CAMERON.

RUTH CAMERON

There are two ways of being afraid in the dark. One is the child's way. He is afraid of hobgoblins and boggie men in the dark corners. The other less recognized, but just as poignant, kind of night fear is the grown-up's unreasoning fear of the future, or to call it by its commoner name, worry.

The grown-up may no longer see hobgoblins in the corners when he wakes up in the night, but he sees all sorts of hobgoblin difficulties and goblin men dangers in his path of life.

It is really uncanny how night can convert the most distant possibility into a gloomy probability, or a molehill into a mountain.

I Knew I Was Going To Be Sick. The other night I waked up some where in the wee small hours with a pain in my shoulder. In the day-time I should have thought nothing of it. As it was, I felt quite convinced that my old and dreaded enemy neuritis was about to make an attack upon me and I fairly cried before that hobgoblin.

I rehearsed all the horrors of the attack that has given my fear of it. Then the fact that I had two engagements for the morrow popped into my mind.

What Shall I do About These Engagements. Instantly I was wider awake and more nervous than ever. If I kept my engagements I might bring the neuritis on. I might keep one and let the other go. No, if I did that, the other person would be sure to hear of it.

An Old Time Chat on Topics in General

UP AT TUCKER'S.

Denis Kelley, he's Mrs. Tucker's first cousin, is in town, or as the papers say of Mr. Butler—"is again amongst us." Last night he came up to the house, and as the "Cute Man" was present, I tell you we had a fine old-time chat. Kelley is of the keen type of outport politicians who place Governments in power, and fire 'em out, when they feel like. He is cuter than the "Cute Man," and that describes him to you "gentle reader" just as well as if you beheld his foxy side-eyes and gazed into his penetrating eyes.

The "Cute Man," always on the alert for news, is keener than ever when a visitor from the outports strikes the entertaining home of the popular Tuckers. He hazarded questions at our friend Kelley at the rate of forty a minute, until streams of perspiration trickled down Kelley's narrow forehead, and wended their way into the eyes of our visitor. But Kelley didn't seem a bit put out, in fact he seemed highly honoured to be asked to give out his opinion on public matters in such distinguished company.

What do you think of our sessions, says the "Cute Man," as you read the report of 'em in the People's Paper. How do they impress you?

The visitor, Kelley, looked over at Mrs. Tucker as if fearing to arouse the indignation of that amiable lady by giving an honest opinion. Well, says he, kind of thoughtfully: "Sometimes they're all right, sometimes middlin' and now and then a kind o' puzzling." "There's one thing about 'em," said Kelley, "and that is they are read, and mind you that says a lot."

The advertisement for "make hens lay" is also read, says Mrs. Tucker, with a smile, but to my mind that don't mean much. Anyway, said she, we never lose any sleep as to how popular they are, popularity in this country don't count for much. You can be as popular as you like, but you can die in the Poor House if you don't carve out your own way of getting along through the world.

Look here, Mr. Kelley, says she, did it ever occur to you that popular persons are as a rule not worth a fish ha-penny, whereas on the other hand, unpopular persons seem to "root in riches."

There's more in the world than's worth having, says Kelley, than money. For my own part, I'd prefer being known as an honest man than to be known to have a big bank account. Of course, I'd like, says he, to be a little independent, but I'd never hanker after owning a big lot of money.

"This only the man who can't get the big pile that says that," said Mrs. Tucker. Get the money and you can be as ugly as you like, and as ignorant as the greatest ignoramus that ever lived, and still all hands are ready to bow and scrape to you.

There are some fine fat jobs vacant just now around here, says Kelley, and 'tis a wonder to me that you don't try to use your influence in getting your husband put into one of 'em.

Oh, yes, says Mrs. Tucker, there's the job on the Bench, in the Magistrate's Court, and there's the Deputy Minister of Justice, a nice clean job, too, but we seem to be getting along first rate without having them filled, and between you and me, sometimes I think that we could save a heap of money to the Revenue if half of the big jobs were left vacant for ever. We don't seem to have the same rule that applies to the ordinary man who has to work every day, hold good in the big positions at all. The better paid a man is in this country the less is expected of him, and he must always have an assistant, or a deputy, on whom he can throw over the biggest share of the work.

Oh, you know, says Kelley, that rule holds good right through life, the more soft snaps we get the more we look for; when a man is poor and is inclined to take things as easy as possible we call him a lazy man, but 'tis the "get salary man" we say that "the burden of his duties have weakened his constitution," and that his doctor has ordered him a "complete rest."

That's true, says Mrs. Tucker, now that I think of it I fancy that most men do get sickly when they get into comfortable jobs, and I believe the reason of it is that the job they strike is heaven-like that they worry themselves to death trying to live long. You take a man for instance who is used to knocking around at the fishery, or has been engaged in any of the tough occupations of this country. While he is at it he can stand any amount of cold or hardship, but let him get into politics and afterwards get himself placed into a fine snug job and he must not let the wind blow on him or he'll catch a cold that will "confine him to his room" for a fortnight at the least.

I'll tell you the reason of that, says Kelley, half the "snug job men" wouldn't be half as sick were it not for the papers. They find out that the "snug man" is sick, and they announce it in the Press, and the "snug man" reading it, and his wife reading it, decides that he must "stay in" for a fortnight at least, in order that the Public will not lose confidence in the "reliability of the Press."

There's a lot in your argument, says Mrs. Tucker, and I'm beginning to wonder why you, Mr. Kelley, escaped getting into politics you are such a knowledgeable man. I think, mind you that you'd make a dandy third man in a district where two members are elected. But to get back to the discourse, I think you're pretty well right about the Papers being the cause of prolonging half of the sickness in town. The Press can make a man popular, the Press can make a man who is not worth his salt possess the wisdom of Solomon in the eyes of the Public, and in like manner the Press can make a man with an ordinary cold believe that he has reached the stage where the country should pay him an annual pension for remaining at home. The Press is a great agency for good, says Tucker, who had just finished cobbling a pair of boots, and joined in the conversation. But, now that the People of this town have seven papers to wade through daily, 'tis a wonder to me that they are as well as they are. Papers were all right in the olden times when they contained three or four pages, but now no ordinary man can stand the strain, for if you want to find out if a vessel arrived, or where to buy a hoghead o' good round coal, why you'd need to have a compass with you.

Tucker quit talking for a while to light his pipe, and when he got her in full bloom, he says: look here, Kelley, says he, I'd like to make a suggestion to the Governor of the Pen, and that is, that he get a copy of all the Papers, sent down to that Institution, and make the prisoners read them all, and ye can take my word for it, that once they get their freedom, they'll not go back there again for fear the dose may be repeated.

The Ranger.

Ten weeks ago the Telegram gave a description of the extensive repairs to the sealing steamer Ranger. The ship was practically rebuilt at a cost of $25,000. She is now at Bowring's Southside premises, and will haul over to the north side next week to be outfit for the sealing voyage. Capt. S. R. Winsor, who brought in a load of seals last spring in the Ranger, now goes in charge of the Ranger and we wish him a bumper trip.

About Pictures and their correct framing.

The art of Picture-framing is a more intricate one than is generally understood. It is not merely the making of a frame, but the selection of suitable Mouldings for the many different subjects, as pictures that are undoubtedly beautiful are often spoiled by unsuitable framing.

- 1 We have for many years made Picture-framing a special feature.
- 1 We have workshops fitted with the most modern appliances for their framing.
- 1 We have men who understand perfectly what Mouldings are needed to throw up their beauty.
- 1 We have the largest stock of Mouldings in the city, and—
- 1 We are prepared to carry out promptly and with complete satisfaction all orders received by us.

ADMIRAL BEATTY'S

On January 18 Sir Basil Beatty, Admiral of the British Navy, a year younger than Nelson, was born. Like that great hero, he was a fisherman's son. His father, John Beatty, was an Irishman, a son of a fisherman, of Baradale, County Wick. He followed a fashionable career, but by choosing an amateur member of the millionaires' club, he became a member of the Beatty family. He was a charming, well-mannered man, and devoted to his family. She and her husband were a house, and a place in the

THE DRINK PROHIBITION

I think it is likely that the Government will not act on the question of the prohibition of beer, over as 50 per cent. That the taxes would raise the price to a figure that would make drinking prohibitive to a part of the population, but the point will be the saving of the mind is tending, but on the question is a definite will be decided.

WOMEN AND THE

Time and circumstances have something to do with the pondering majority at the meetings of the Bar on the subject of taking any measures against the admission of qualified women to the profession. Some thirteen hundred women are serving with the colours, and include many of the ablest members of the profession. It is deemed unjust that in the expression of opinion, any change in the existing should be enunciated. That gathered, was pretty general meeting, although I must say that on the merits of the advocates of the change, very formidable mass of conservatism. Mr. Halliday's motion on the subject was framed. It only asked that the Council of the Bar should report on the desirability of providing for the admission of qualified women to the profession. He supported it in a speech, every word of which was clearly to the point. The Inner Temple Hall, where he was being held. As the capacity, not sex, should be a criterion for a career of the law, it struck me as a coincidence that behind the Attorney-General, a striking reminder of the important functions in the
