

Jeannie Sinclair,

OR THE LILY OF THE STRATH.

'I will crush you as effectually as you have crushed me. Believe it or not, as you please, but the time will come when you will find it true. Yes, Lynedoch Sinclair, I will be your ruin. I will gloat over your downfall. I will add tenfold torture to the mortification of your baffled schemes. Should you forget this interview, the day will come when you shall have ample cause to remember it. It may be years hence; but the hour of retribution shall come.

A mocking smile of incredulous contempt played on Lynedoch's thin lips as Will gave utterance to these passionate words. So soon as he found that Will did not mean to proceed to physical violence on that occasion, his alarm vanished, and he was succeeded by a cool, scornful indifference, and a mental resolution to wear a pistol in his bosom when in future he stirred abroad. If he had had such a weapon now, his bearing towards Will would have been very different; but being unarmed, and noting well his antagonist's strength of bone and muscle, he felt that in a physical encounter he would have the worst of it, and was forced to restrain himself. For anything more, he had no dread whatever, treating Will's threats of future revenge as so much idle breath, or at least as easily provided against by going around armed. Very composedly, therefore, with a mocking, maddening smile, he sat listening to Will's last fierce words of denunciation and doom, and when, with a jerk, the latter flung the rein from him, and rushed down the steep slope on the brink of which they stood, Lynedoch followed his headlong departure by a loud taunting laugh, and rode forward at a walking pace down the glen.

To say that he was left quite undisturbed by this interview would not be true. He had forgot all about Nell and his conduct to her, and never expected to hear more on the subject. As to what had become of her, or the consequences she might have to endure, he never thought of. The whole thing with him had been a mere matter of fancy—a piece of undiluted libertinism. And when his visit at Mossburn Castle terminated, he looked upon his affair with the lady's maid as having terminated too. But here it was brought up again in rather an annoying fashion, and callous though he was, it did touch him a little to learn that the result had been Nell's death.

For some minutes he could not dismiss the interview with Will Sanderson from his mind, but he had not ridden a mile without weightier and more important thoughts banished it—the thoughts in which he had been absorbed when his progress down the glen had been so unexpectedly interrupted. A knowledge of the thoughts of Lynedoch Sinclair's nature. Selfishness was the undermost layer of his mind, and that which nature was composed. This feature had characterized him as a boy, and though then its inevitable accompaniments had not manifested themselves, their coming was but a question of time. Selfishness unchecked leads, as life advances, to all manner of wrong desires, underhand courses, schemes, plots, and even crimes. The selfishness in Lynedoch Sinclair's heart had never been curbed, and as he grew up he unscrupulously ministered to it till the attainment of a desired object or thing was striven for with a cunning and persistence proportioned to the difficulty of attainment.

An early dream of his life had been to become Sir Lynedoch Sinclair, and possessor of Bagley Castle and the princely estate around it. This dream was not utterly unjustifiable, for he was the cousin of Sir Fergus, the present possessor, and for a long time the heir presumptive. Should Sir Fergus, who was twelve years his senior, die without issue, the title and estate came immediately to Lynedoch, and these two events were always the subject of Lynedoch's pleasant contemplation. The Baronet was a healthy, but a fast living man, a keen sportsman, a fast hunter, and, at gatherings of country gentlemen, a hard drinker. In view of these things, Lynedoch calculated that ere long he would wear out his constitution, or—better luck still—that some accident would befall him in the hunting field, which would bring his days to a close. Such things did happen—a false leap over a fence, the bursting of a gun—various chances there were of Sir Fergus coming to a sudden death, and the dream of Lynedoch's life being speedily fulfilled.

As to a son and heir coming to cut him out, Lynedoch had for years got rid of that fear. Nay, he never really cherished it, for when he was old enough to nourish the prospect of inheriting Bagley, Sir Fergus had been several years married, and no children had come to bless the union. As the years passed away, the circumstance—which was a subject of such intense regret to the Baronet—came to be looked on, not only by Lynedoch, but by all, as unalterable. But who may describe the open joy of Sir Fergus, or the secret dismay of Lynedoch, when it became known that the wife of the Baronet was in that state in which 'ladies like to be who love their lords.'

PERUVIAN SYRUP.

A protected solution of the Protoxide of Iron supplies the blood with its Life Element, Iron, giving strength, vigor and new life to the whole system.

If the thousands who are suffering from DYSPEPSIA, DEBILITY, FEMALE WEAKNESSES, &c.

would but test the virtues of the Peruvian Syrup the effect would not only astonish themselves, but would please all their friends, for instead of being cross, all gone and miserable, they would be cheerful, vigorous and active.

A distinguished Jurist writes to a friend as follows: "I have tried the Peruvian Syrup, and the result fully sustains your prediction. It has made a New Man of me, infused into my system new vigor and energy. I am no longer tremulous and debilitated, as when you last saw me, but stronger, heartier, and with larger capacity for labor, mental and physical, than at any time during the last 3 years. Thousands have been changed by the use of this remedy from weak, sickly, suffering creatures, to strong, healthy, and happy men and women; and invalids cannot reasonably hesitate to give it a trial."

The genuine has "Peruvian Syrup" blowing the glass. A 22 page pamphlet will be sent free.
