"In no other way."
"And you found out your cousin was full of faults?"
"No," she answered, "I found no faults, only vices. He is both vicious and weak. He has neither the wish nor the will to throw them off."
"I am glad," he said, "that you had the strength and courage to do this, but it was a terrible task for you to undertake; was there no one to do it for you?"
"No one."
"No one."
"No one."
"No even your mother?"
"Mamma is almost moreanxious than the others that I should marry him."
"I see. Why have they chosen you as the sacrificial lamb?"
His voice was deep and full with suppressed scorn and bitterness; and dark though it was, Diana, in imagination, could almost see the grim, wrathful expression which his face would wear. Her mood was changing too. Grief and disappointment were turning to scorn and anger, and she answered his question truthfully:
"He cannot honorably sak any girl to marry him. A certain confession would have to be made, which they think could be dispensed with if he married me."
"Excellent! That is the kind of a thing they call a family arrangement, is it not? But how do you know this?"
"He told me once, but they do not know; they have no idea that I know they are trying to make a tool of me. They think I am in perfect ignorance of the inner working of their scheme."
Loud and ringing was the laughter which broke from her companion's lips as soon as she had finished speaking. "Admirable!"
Loud and ringing was the laughter which broke from her companion's lips as soon as she had finished speaking. "Admirable!"
He said—"truly admirable! Keep your counsel, and as long as you will never be at a loss for amusing reflections. A mother's love is indeed a beautiful and holy thing. Oh God! I could almost—"
He broke off suddenly; what he had been going to say she never knew. He was glad it was dark, that Diana could not see his face, and guess from it what was passing in his mind. Wrath and pity, harred and love, stern resolve and boundless longing, bitter, passionate secorn and deepest tenderness, w
