Holding close a broken toy, Weary from his busy day, Lies the sleepy little boy Lisping in his halting way:
"Now I lay me—" and he stops,
Thinking of some happy while, And each heavy eyelid drops, As his lips bend in a smile.

"Now I lay me-" once again, Slowly, slowly, he begins, Ho! the blessed little men Need not tell their tale of sins! They, foreshriven, clean of soul, Sink into the sea of sleep, Where the soundless billows roll And the silent breezes sweep.

"Now I lay me-" that is all. Fingers limply loose their clasp, And the broken toy may fall All unheeded from his grasp. For the prayer he would say, Though unfinished, has been heard—Angels, when it trailed away, Whispered each unspoken word.

And the old man, ripe in years— Child again in heart and mind sleepy song he hears Gropes for words he cannot find. Quavering, he whispers low The dim prayers that arise From the mists of long ago, And a great mist fills his eyes.
