12 THE HISTORY OF

man defined to be my hufband; I fancied he loved me, and that gratitude obliged me to a return: carried away by the ardor of my friends for this marriage, I rather fuffered than approved his addreffes; I had not courage to refift the torrent, I therefore gave way to it; I loved no other, I fancied my want of affection a native coldnefs of temper. I felt a languid effeem, which I endeavoured to flatter myfelf was love; but the moment I faw you, the delufion vanifhed.

Your eyes, my Rivers, in one moment convinced me I had a heart; you flaid fome weeks with us in the country : with what transport do I recollect those pleasing moments! how did my heart beat whenever you approached me! what charms did I find in your conversation ! I heard you talk with a delight of which I was not mistrefs. I fancied every woman who faw you felt the fame emotions : my tenderness increased imperceptibly without my perceiving the consequences of my indulging the dear pleasure of feeing you.

I found I loved, yet was doubtful of your fentiments; my heart, however, flattered me yours was equally affected; my fituation prevented an explanation; but love has a thousand ways of making himfelf understood.

How dear to me were those fost, those delicate attentions, which told me all you felt for me, without communicating it to others !

Do you remember that day, my Rivérs, when, fitting in the little hawthorn grove, near the borders of the river, the reft of the company, of which Sir George was one, ran to look at a fhip that was paffing: I would have followed; you asked me to stay, by a look which it was impossible to mistake; nothing could be more imprudent than my flay, yet
