AT THE UNITARIAN CHURCH

Dr. Smith's summary, thought Mr. Hutcheon, was beyond criticism, but it dealt more particularly with the negative results of modern thought.

A word of constructive criticism by Mr. Hutcheon was to the effect that Dr. Smith was too suspicious of the deepest springs of human action. One of the limitations of intellectual man was that they were afraid to trust to their emotions. They see that the emotions clog the operations of the mind altogether. They allow the mind to strangle the emotions, or overlook the fact that the emotions may be one of our best clues to the truth.

The willingness to venture their lives on a belief for which we may not get complete evidence was absent, and in this respect Dr. Smith might seem too detached. The men of action would be more willing to risk something. They will turn to Martineau, Emerson, Whiteman and Browning, none of whom held the orthodox positions, but who had a living faith in the basic life and heart of the universe itself, in union with which in their inner being men found their deepest strength.

Men go to work boldly to build new est strength.

Men go to work boldly to build new philosophies of life on the rims of the old social and religious order, and Mr. Hutcheon's ambition was not to stop where Dr. Smith seemed to stop, but to make his venture and press on with the young generation to the new world of faith and the new world of social endeavor.

For many reasons Dr. Smith's letter was a peculiarly impressive one. Born in the 20's of the last century he had witnessed with an elert mind the rise of the whole of the intellectual movements of the modern world. These include Biblical criticism, the evolutionary theory, the social and economic views and at the heart of the literary movements of the past century. He has been acutely sensitive to all these movements, and he therefore speaks with the authority of a very great experience.

blown up by the dynamite of modern history, science and democracy. Modernism in the Roman Church, and Biblical criticism in the Protestant Church had overthrown the old views.

Whether we are able to build another theology or not men will always be able to find satisfaction in ways be able to find satisfaction in triendship, love, marriage, culture and art. This may seem mere heathenism to the dogmatic religionist, but we must see that these are never falling sources of human happiness. Immortality is not desired for the sake of mere existence, but for the purpose of preserving the values that have grown up out of our human existence.

But this is not the only source of happiness to which Goldwin Smith turns. There is the assurance of human progress. Man has free will. His life is like a river, not losing it. of a general election in this province.

Fonr years ago Mr. Dugas made a speech in Rawdon, during which he assured his listeners that the railway would be built from their willage to Montcalm, and if, in fact, he did not come to see them at the next general election in a railway car they might vote against him.

Following this declaration, the parish priest of Rawdon, Rev. Father Landry, asked from his pulpit that his parishloners forget their party politics for the moment and vote for the man who would give them the much-desired railway.

Conservatives and Liberals alike voted for Mr. Dugas, who obtained a good with it.
