CANADIAN ATHLETES' HARD LUCK

(Times Special Correspondence)
London, July 19—Whatever hopes of victory for the Canadians at Henley may have been held by others, J. G. Merrick, manager of the Canadian Olympic team, entertained considerable doubt as to their success. Several days before they competed he advanced several reasons which in his opinion would lead to their defeat. Canadians in London naturally regret that the efforts of the Canadians were not crowned with success but some consolation may be found in the fact that conditions were abnormal and unfortunate.

"The backward season in Canada," said Mr. Merrick, "prevented the athletes in nearly all branches from getting into finished condition; neither did the additional training in England produce this result. Indeed the weather conditions during the first five days of practice in England were as unfavorable as any in Canada. It must be remembered that good weather conditions are a necessity to successful training and that no class of athlete is so susceptible to climatic influences as the canoeist. Louis & Nash & Co.

$5,000 YEAR FOR BREAKING SUNDAY LAW

Tradesmen of Hull, England Are Systematically Violating It
PAY UP EVERY WEEK

One Man Has Done This Fifty Two Times a Year for Thirteen Years — Funny Complications Caused By Other English Shop Laws

(Times Special Correspondence)
London, July 19—All kinds of queer complications have resulted already from the new law in this country which compels all shopkeepers to give their assistants a weekly half-holiday—it not being clear at the start just which tradesmen were affected and which were not. There will have to be still more fuss, however, before the Shops' Act, as it is called, ranks as a trouble-shooter and provider of queer legal puzzles with sundry other laws, mostly of the "blue" variety, which cumber the English statute books at present.

One of the most brain-racking of these is the law regarding Sunday trading, which differs in different districts, and is enforced in some parts of the country and not in others. One of the many puzzles which have arisen out of it concerned a bake shop which happens to be half in and half out of London. Now while in London, a bake-shop must be shut by one o'clock on Sunday, the closing time just outside the metropolis is one-thirty, so what is the answer? At last accounts, the owner of the shop and the local authorities on the metropolitan side of the boundary line still were arguing the point, which was more important than it might seem, most poor folk in the metropolis having their Sunday dinners cooked, or at least warmed-up at the local bake-shop.

A question of this kind about a saloon, or private house can be overcome by taking out two licenses. Here is a real case. The boundary-line between Darwen and Chorley, two towns in Lancashire, runs straight through the middle of a saloon, one of the two "public rooms," as they are called in which the workings of the district "put down" the demon rum, being on one side of the line and the second on the other.

The closing hour in Darwen is ten, whereas in Chorley it is an hour later. Accordingly, on the basis of ten, ingenious landlord invites his Darwen customers to step into the Chorley saloon, as he has a license for that township the law cannot touch him.

Oddly enough, under the English licensing it is possible for a saloon to be at one and the same time, in a "banquet" where the closing hour is ten and in a "city" or other place where the shut-up time is eleven. Awhile ago a saloon-keeper whose premises were in a hamlet containing fewer than 2,500 inhabitants, the closing hour in which, according to the act, is ten, persisted in keeping open until eleven—according to his and his customers' minds—more suitable hour of eleven.

Why? Because, and on appeal he was held to be right, though the hamlet might be a place within the statute, the saloon was still within "another place," i. e. a parish containing more than 2,500 people.

As for the administration of the old Lord's Day Observance Act, which forbade trading on Sunday, it is a little more than a farce. In some places it is a dead letter and there is one town where, by an oversight in the drafting of a local act, places of amusement of all kinds can be open on Sunday. On the other hand, in some places the law is enforced rigorously.

In one of these places, which, after a long time of neglect, began to put the law into force, a shop-keeper who defied it was fined every Monday for nineteen weeks in succession. At the twentieth time he paid the penalty—ten shillings, or £2.50 odd—in "threepenny bits," miserable little thin coins about half as big as a ten-cent piece—which were declined and he was given a day or two to "pay properly."

But as never—the law does not specify what kind is the legal tender for sums under ten dollars the tradesman—who was an excellent amateur lawyer—insisted that he was within his rights in offering the "threepenny" bits. The bench, at the end, grudgingly agreed to take them, whereupon the man promptly refused to pay at all, and defied them to enforce a fine they, in fact, could not collect.

The town that enforces the Lord's Day Observance Act most zealously is Hull—which is anxious not to have its name misspelled. For years, every Sunday trader in that part has been summoned with clockwork regularity. Most shopkeepers there put their shutters up late on Saturday night and do not take them down until Monday morning, but a few tobacco-nists and others defy the law, and cheerfully take the consequences.

The usual fine is five shillings or about a dollar and a quarter, and the law-breakers, as a rule, send the money to the police court every Monday morning. One man has paid the "amari" as it is called, every week for thirteen years and calls it his "special police rate." Probably the taxpayers of Hull would be sorry to have these tradesmen stop violating the law for the fines they pay amount to nearly $5,000 a year, which relieves the "rates" just that much.
