ST. SOPHIA'S TEMPLE

HOME IN DANGER

Masterpiece Which Has Lived Through Centuries Now Seeling to Ruin For Lack of Repair

Constantinople, Aug. 5.—The magnificent dome of the world-famed Byzantine fane of St. Sophia ("Divine Wisdom"), an incomparable architectural marvel of ages past, is beginning to yield to the heavy weight of its sixteen centuries of existence. Time, humidity, earthquakes, conflagrations, bombardments, have each and all contributed their share of damage, undermining slowly but surely the strength and solidity of a proud memorial of Hellenic inspiration and achievement.

It is not likely that the dome will ever be restored to its full original beauty and magnificence, as only the designer, Anthemius of Tralles, who died in the sixth century, knew the mysterious problems and the secrets of its marvellous construction. Already the casual observer perceives that the external aspect of the cupola presents no more a smooth, unblemished surface.

The eastern part of it deflects downwards. This is the part that has suffered most the course of ages. In 1688 it was destroyed by an earthquake, together with the apse and the ambon. What it was rebuilt the whole dome was raised several feet higher than its original elevation, a performance which was regarded as a wonderful architectural feat.

The Emperor John VI Palaeologus in the 14th century did much to preserve the temple. In more recent times (1847) the enlightened Sultan Abdul Medjid undertook the reparation of the damage done by time and earthquakes. He employed the Italian architect Fossati, who performed it, on the whole, exceedingly well. Thanks to his thorough restorations the temple of St. Sophia was able to withstand the assaults of several disastrous earthquakes.

During the calamitous earthquake of 1893 the dome was again greatly damaged, and several serious fissures were opened. Through these rain-water permeated, and still permeates, the whole masonic texture of the dome, thus constantly weakening it. Several cracks and fissures also, barely perceptible to the naked eye, disfigure the harmony of the superb mosaics in the interior of the dome. Several local attempts to fill up these chinks have proved far beyond Turkish skill and knowledge, and what was once an object of glory and splendor is now a picture of decay and of threatening ruin. A Constantinople newspaper declares that if nothing is done soon the dome will break down in about fifteen or twenty years.

Last year the Ottoman government engaged the well-known Italian architect, Signor Marangoni, who had restored the Campanile on the Piazza St. Marco in Vienna, to investigate St. Sophia's dome and submit a detailed account of necessary repairs. Signor Marangoni estimated the cost of these repairs at about $500,000. The Ottoman government considered this was too high a sum to be spent on an object that is, after all, of no paramount national interest, to the Moslems themselves, since the edifice is, of course, a Christian house of worship. They committed therefore to bargain with Signor Marangoni, who left Constantinople in disgust.

A special commission has now been formed of French, Italian and Turkish experts. But as is generally the case in Turkey, an interminable period of discussion must first ensue, during which affairs are left to fate. A competent authority states, however, that this commission is quite unable to perform the task and that, in the end, Signor Marangoni will again be requested to undertake the restoration of the dome, this time with a free hand.
