ful room? Should he wake her? Hadn't she said something about leaving in a quarter of an hour? Grey rose from his chair and moved to-ward the sleeping woman. In an instant she was wide awake, with a fierce, hunted look upon her features, and the hand which had hung over the side of her chair swittly travelled to a pocket in her dress. Grey stayed where he was. "I-I beg your pardon," he said. "Five minutes gone."

"1-1 beg your parties, "how a some," "I-1 beg your parties," how a some," "Five: Oh-h-b yes, I-1"- She became more composed and looked around as if endeavoring to remember where she was. And tomorrow—if can only hold out until tomorrow—if can tell the truth; but if I don't sleep tonight I shall go mad —I shall go mad." Grey took her arm within his own. "Come, we'll go at once." She leaned against him, struggling to overcome her drowsiness. "Its so—warm, so warm, and bright," she murmured sleepily. "So warm. 'an't we stay a lit—no. no, we mustn't, we mustn't. The lamplight's turning to blood. Keep me —awake! For God's sake, keep me awake. Kee-ep"—And her eyes closed again. Grey made a desperate effort to get his companion out of the hot room down the back stair of the hotel. When they were once outside the freah air revived her. It had ceased snowing. Countless bilt-ing lights of the Aurora Borealis flitted in filmy curtains of lace across a steely blue sky. The keen air bid Grey to the bone as he half led, half dragged bis companion to-wards the jail, a huge, sombre stone build-ing at the outer end of the village. The recent snow had filled up the woman's tootsteps. As Grey dragged her along, all past
